every one, it seems to me, why the Government should not open its Treasury for this exhibition—at any rate not now. The very moment the United States appropriates $3,000,000 for the purposes of this exhibition, all other subscriptions will stop. Do you think that State Legislatures are going to appropriate money for this purpose if the Government of the United States does so? Do you suppose that private individuals are going to put their hands in their pockets to help out the Government of the United States? They say "We pay our taxes." And the rich men will say, "We pay our proportion of this very money which goes out of the Treasury to erect the buildings and make this exhibition a success." You cut off all other resources at once; and it is no extraordinary exhibition of human selfishness that would lead to this result. It is the ordinary operation of the human mind; and every Senator, who will reflect a moment, will see that, if the United States proposes to be the responsible responding party for this exhibition, it has got to bear the whole burden, and it will not be shared by others.

If this is to be a world's fair on the scale of Vienna, and if we invite all nations to it as is proposed, can it be less, if they will come; and if they will not come, ought we to invite them? I say, if they will come, can it be on a less scale than that of Vienna? We cannot erect wooden structures, we cannot make cattle-pens to hold their treasures of art or their manufactures. We cannot appear in a sordid aspect to those men who have seen the magnificent exhibitions of Paris, and London, and of Vienna. We have got to erect our crystal palaces, rising high above the elms of the park where they will be located; and we have got to have our great fountains; we have got to have all gilded and crystaled accessories. It must be on a scale of magnificence commensurate with that which other nations do, or else it is a failure, and a subject for sneers on the part of those whom we invite here.

Has any one calculated the cost of this? The city of Philadelphia, we are told, has appropriated $500,000, and the State of Pennsylvania has appropriated $1,000,000, besides some private subscriptions by leading citizens there, who are to be commended for their public spirit, perhaps to an amount nearly as much more. This is the extent to which the city of Philadelphia has redeemed the pledge made by one of the representatives that it would bear all the expenses of this great exhibition as any other great city would do. But has the State, in its corporate capacity, or the city of Philadelphia, appropriated a million and a half for the purposes of this exhibition? Very much the contrary. If the United States appropriates any money for this purpose, it is to pay all kinds of debts and erect any kind of buildings which the corporation may designate; it is to go in for the general purposes of the exhibition. But the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania are not satisfied to go in on the same level with the Government of the United States. They ask us to put our hands into our Treasury and pass out $3,000,000, while they put their hands into their treasury collectively and take out $1,500,000 to erect a memorial hall or art gallery, there to remain.

Mr. CONKLING. How much?

Mr. SARGENT. A million by the State and $500,000 by the city.

Mr. CONKLING. To be put into a building?

Mr. SARGENT. To be put into a building which is to remain there. I will read—I think it is a very interesting fact and one which should arrest the attention of Senators. The statement must be authentic, for I find it is in the report of the international exhibition of 1876 by the officers of the centennial commission; and they say:

> The United States centennial commission and the board of finance were duly organized, and have presented to the people full information of the purposes and scope of the exhibition and celebration by every means at their command.
> Through the press, addresses and circulars to the public were published, informing them that the national banks throughout the country were empowered to receive subscriptions, and were supplied with the necessary books and forms. No satisfactory results have been realized from these efforts, except in Pennsylvania; which State stands pledged for about $3,000,000, upon the following basis, namely, one and a half millions of private subscriptions, one million conditionally appropriated by the State, and a half million by the city of Philadelphia; both appropriations to be expended in the erection of a memorial building, which is to be used as the fine-art gallery. And these two amounts are not available for the other buildings of the exhibition.

And are not available for the ordinary expenses of the exhibition. They are tied up, selfishly tied up, in order that the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania may have there in that park forever a building erected by their own money as an art gallery, as a memorial hall. Is that fair to the Government of the United States when you come forward here and ask us to give you $3,000,000, and we show you, by all the experience of the past, by the cost of exhibitions like this, that instead of $3,000,000 it will reach $17,000,000 at the very lowest estimate, even if we can get labor as cheap and material as cheap and be as economical as they were at Vienna? I ask, is it fair that the whole amount which is doled out by your Legislature and by your city shall be confined to the erection of a building adapted to their own purposes, and which is to remain after the exhibition has passed away, and not to be sold like the other buildings of the exhibition for the purpose of satisfying the debts of the concern?

Why, sir, what are the resources of an international exhibition? In the first place, the amount which may be appropriated by the government or subscribed by individuals for the purposes of the exhibition; secondly, the receipts for the use of space on the floor; thirdly, the receipts from visitors daily or otherwise, season or other tickets; and next and last, the sale of the buildings and property of the concern; and this last is a very important consideration. But so far as the State of Pennsylvania is concerned, and the city of Philadelphia, they do not propose that their contribution shall be part of the assets of this corporation. They will not trust it with this corporation. Talk not to me about the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania not having anything upon their garments in this connection. I say they selfishly ask that the whole amount which they appropriated in official capacities shall be segregated from the rest and set aside for a permanent benefit to the State and the city. I do not object; no one would object to the city of Philadelphia or the State of Pennsylvania erecting a magnificent building there that should rival anything that the sun ever shone upon; but they ought not to take the fund which belongs to this exhibition for that purpose. Whatever they contribute should go into the common fund, to be expended and to be as available as the money that the Government of the United States may put into it, and which they come to us asking us to put into it, and which its own citizens, or the State of New Jersey, or the citizens of Oregon, or the poor, feeble citizens of Arizona may contribute of their little means.

Sir, I have reasoned thus far to show that the original purpose and intent of the gentlemen who have urged this upon the attention of Congress was not to make it a Treasury charge. I have also tried to show that we ought not, considering the condition of the Treasury, to make it such charge; that we ought to stop. If it is already becoming a question of national faith, let us go no further. If we have not yet compromised ourselves, as I have tried to show we have not, let us not take a step which will do so, and the result of which may be that within the next two years the drafts upon the Treasury on this account will be from seventeen to twenty million dollars.

I should like to have gentlemen, if they see fit to reply to this portion of my remarks, show me what reasonable hope there is that a world's fair, an international exposition, to which all nations shall be invited, can be run upon such a scale of expense—can be run for one-fifth of the expense of that at Vienna? Is it alleged that there were any defalcations there—that there was any wastefulness in the use of funds there? I have heard nothing of the kind, aside from some slight scandal which attached to some commissioners who were sent there on our part. I have never heard or read that there was any on the part of the officials of Austria, or that the whole thing was not as economically managed as was possible for an affair of that kind. I say if this is to be made a national charge, and we are to embark in it, let us have the reasons which gentlemen have to suggest why it shall cost only $3,000,000 or $5,000,000, and shall not exceed $20,000,000; for that is an important consideration. But if we intend to adopt this exposition or exhibition, and make it a Treasury charge, this bill is entirely unnecessary. Let us see what the law heretofore required, and what has been done.

It is said that the Secretary of State has misinterpreted the law, or it is suggested that he has not been as warm in his missive as the occasion required toward this matter; and that he or the Administration must be quickened by further suggestions or statutes, which shall require of them more impulsively to rush into the arms of other nations and exhibit our intended display to their attention.

Mr. SCOTT. This is the first time I ever heard that suggestion made; and if such an imputation has been made on the Secretary of State, certainly it has come from no other quarter than the Senator from California thus far. I have never heard it from any other quarter.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator let me understand him?

Mr. SCOTT. His letter was read, simply stating that the President had gone as far as the act of Congress had entitled him to do, and the misapprehension which the consular officers and ministers to whom it was sent had been under was now desired to be corrected.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator understands, of course, that in every measure of this kind, especially when attracting public attention, and where the attention of Senators is specially desired to it, the suggestions upon it are from two sources: first, in the debate which takes place on the floor, and second, those of delegations who come and talk to Senators personally and urge reasons why the bill should be passed. The Senator will have no difficulty in learning, if he will inquire of his colleagues of the House of Representatives, that they themselves have already, and have repeatedly, said to Senators and to others that the Secretary of State had misconstrued the law, had not gone far enough in carrying it out, and that this was to correct his mistake. That is the theory of it; and if it was not, why were not the provisions of this bill put in last year? Why this new law on the subject? Why this necessity for a duplicate invitation? The Secretary of State first called the attention of other powers to it; and why should he now invite these powers over again? Simply because he did not comply with the anxious solicitude of Pennsylvania gentlemen, and of the officers of this commission, in spreading this attractively before other peoples.

Mr. SCOTT. I neither wish to be put in a false position myself, nor to put the Senator from California in a false position; but his utterances were such as to leave the impression that the gentlemen connected with this exhibition had been imputing a want of ardor on the part of the Secretary of State; that it was an improper want of ardor; and I only wish to state that, so far as I know, no gentleman connected with the exhibition has ever made such an imputation upon the Secretary of State. If there was a mistake about the construction of the law, either by the Secretary of State or by our ministers, that is an entirely different thing from an imputation of want of interest in the exhibition; for the Secretary of State, in the very letter which I read, expressed the warmest interest in it.

Mr. SARGENT. I simply intended to be understood, and I think the Senator could have no difficulty in understanding me if he had been listening to me, that it was alleged that the Secretary of State made a mistake in the construction of this law, and consequently had not sent so warm an invitation to other powers as the gentlemen having charge of this exposition desired. That I said. That I now say. That I understand to be the position of Pennsylvania gentlemen, and I wished to show, and I intended to read the law to show, that the Secretary of State had exactly complied with that which we required at his hands, and made no mistake in the construction of the law; but it was to the question of mistake and not to the question of interest or intent that I spoke.

Now, let us see what the law required him to do. I say, so far from making a mistake in not issuing this invitation early enough or not issuing an invitation warm enough, I think if there was any mistake it was in going too far entirely, in not waiting until, in the language of the law, there was suitable provision made for the erection of buildings by the Philadelphia or Pennsylvania authorities for the purposes of this exhibition.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator totally misapprehends the source of mistake. If he will refer to the remarks I made, I think he will find that the mistake which was made and which is sought to be corrected was not the mistake of the Secretary of State, but the mistake of the consular officers and ministers to whom this invitation was sent out.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator now is talking about an entirely different matter, and I may remark upon that before I get through if it occurs to me; but it is a matter of entirely minor importance whether the consular officers did consider themselves each one a missionary in foreign countries to the Imaum of Muscat and the Khedive of Egypt to give them, with their barbarous understanding of such invitations, warm invitations to come to hospitable America and visit our exposition, they flamingly representing the attractiveness of America and our desire to embrace them upon our own shores; but the Secretary of State reminded them in a circular letter that his letter was not intended to invite them to any such frantic efforts. I say if that is worth remark I will remark on it by and by. I think the Secretary of State was perfectly right in cautioning these gentlemen, many of whom are untrained in diplomacy, who are inexperienced in these matters, who do not know how to use the stately and cold phrase which comes from the old courts of Europe when they come to us with invitations for their exhibitions. He did perfectly right in calming down their enthusiasm, and saying to them in plain, practical language, "Gentlemen, go slowly; I did not intend anything of the kind, and I do not desire you to speak for me in that way."

But the point I am speaking about is whether the Secretary of State made a mistake in the document which he himself sent out to foreign nations commending this exhibition to them, whether he did not go just as far as the law authorized him to go, and if he had gone further, whether really it would not have been a mistake and perhaps a censurable mistake, caused by erring on the other side; and it is to that error and not any question of intent that I desire to address myself.

Section 8 of the first bill passed on this subject requires—

That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission herein provided for of the proposed exhibition, the President shall, through the Department of State, &c.

Before I read the rest of it let us go back. This language is expressive: "That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose." Now has any such information ever come from the governor of the State of Pennsylvania? Has there been provision made for the erection of suitable buildings for this exposition? It is confessed that they have taken only subscriptions, many of which it is known will never be collected, a mere form. A large percentage of the subscriptions made for all such purposes never are collected. The obligation to pay them is imperfect, reposing rather in honor than otherwise; and the accidents of business prevent men from redeeming their promises of that kind frequently, and a panic has intervened which has crippled many. So the amount to be realized of this million and a half of subscriptions must fall very short indeed of the amount subscribed. But the only amount which there was a certainty they would get, a million and a half, was not pledged for suitable buildings for this exposition, and the governor of Pennsylvania knew the fact and ought not to have certified that there was provision made for such suitable buildings, if he has so certified; and I criticise him fearlessly and boldly in this matter, because I am confronted with the proposition, "Shall millions of money be taken from the Treasury of the United States?" I cannot afford to handle such a question with kid gloves. I mean to say just what I think, and I say the governor of Pennsylvania never should have so certified when the million and a half given by his State and city was not for the purpose of the exhibition or for suitable buildings, but was simply for a memorial hall, there to remain, and which might not be at all adapted to the purposes of the exhibition, and if it were is inadequate. Both the Secretary of State and the President of the United States, in taking such a suggestion as that, certainly went as far and as quickly as the law would allow them to do.

The law says that this important preliminary being done, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth—what?

Setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners for publication in their respective countries.

Is there anything there said as to a letter of invitation to them? Is it there said that they shall be "cordially invited, in the name of the United States, to an exhibition to be held under the auspices of the United States?" Is he required to do anything more than to send to them a copy of this proclamation of the President, which is not addressed to them at all and not intended by the law to be addressed to them? Why do gentlemen say that the Secretary of State, or anybody else, made a mistake in the construction of this law? Let us see what the proclamation is, and see if the manifesto does not come up to the phrase of the statute:

Whereas by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, providing for a national celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the independence of the United States, by the holding of an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876, it is provided as follows.

Then it recites the statute, which I will not now repeat.

And whereas his excellency the governor of the said State of Pennsylvania did, on the 24th day of June 1873, inform me that provision has been made for the erection of said buildings and for the exclusive control by the commission provided for in the said act of the proposed exhibition; and whereas the president of the United States centennial commission has officially informed me of the dates fixed for the opening and closing of the said exhibition and the place at which it is to be held:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress aforesaid, do hereby declare and proclaim that there will be held at the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, to be opened on the 19th day of April, A. D. 1876, and to be closed on the 19th day of October, in the same year.

And in the interest of peace, civilization, and domestic and international friendship and intercourse, I commend the celebration and exhibition to the people of the United States.

That was as far as, by following the strict phrase of the statute, this proclamation may well have proceeded. Anything further than that was beyond the statute. Anything further than that was simply an exhibition of executive interest in the matter, which perhaps the President might properly express if he saw fit, but which we did not require him to do by anything that we put in the statute. But he goes on and says:

And, in behalf of this Government and people, I cordially commend them to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 3d day of July, 1873, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

[SEAL.] U. S. GRANT.

There is nothing said in the statute about commending it to other nations; but simply that a copy of the proclamation and a copy of the regulations which might be prescribed by the corporation having it in charge should be sent out. Now, sir, the question is whether this commendation to other nations is not as far as our national dignity will allow us to go. I have in my hand, which I received this morning from the Department of State at my request, a copy of a translation of the document from the legation of France to the United States in March, 1865, and it proceeds with cold and stately formality to notify the Government of the United States that France has decreed, in its wisdom, that it will hold an exhibition, and that it has appointed certain high officials, with many ascriptions to their glory, to celebrate it, and asks us if we will not send some commissioners to take charge of our interests in the matter; and that is all. There is no invitation for us to come there. I will read a portion of this—it is somewhat lengthy—to show the style of the document which they sent:

SIR: By two decrees, dated the 22d June and 1st of last month, the Emperor has ordered that a universal exhibition of the productions of agriculture, manufactures, and the fine arts should be opened at Paris the 1st May, 1867. Another decree, also issued the 1st February of this year, and published in the Moniteur the 21st of the same month, has placed this grand international solemnity under the direction and supervision of a commission, the presidency of which has been confided to his serene highness Prince Napoleon. Such a selection bears too high testimony to the importance which the Emperor attaches to the success of this universal exhibition to leave any need to dwell upon it. As to the commission, it is composed of several of His Majesty's ministers, of high functionaries of state, as well as of the most competent of notable individuals. The government of His Majesty charges me to give notice officially of these aforesaid decrees to the Cabinet of Washington, to invite its valuable concurrence, and to designate an authority with which the imperial commission could have a direct understanding.

It would also be of advantage, to avoid all loss of time——

Mr. SCOTT. Does the Senator say that is not an invitation?

Mr. SARGENT. I do. It is not an invitation to come; it is simply inviting our concurrence in the coldest manner:

It would also be of advantage, to avoid all loss of time, that the Government of the United States should make choice at Paris of an agent who would be specially delegated to be near his serene highness the Prince Napoleon.

And then they go on to show that this mode of proceeding would be convenient for all concerned; and there is nothing there more strong, a greater departure from diplomatic formality, than this language of the President where he says:

And in behalf of this Government and people I cordially commend them to all nations who may be pleased to take part in the same.

The proclamation of the President was exuberant compared with the coolness of this other document. Of course, in this French document we are called upon to contemplate his serene highness Prince Napoleon and the other magnates who have charge of the enterprise; and we are especially informed that the Emperor by two decrees has said there shall be an international exposition; and that is all there is of it.

Here is a copy of the document which came on behalf of Vienna:

WASHINGTON, June 29, 1870.

Mr. SECRETARY OF STATE: By a resolution of May 24, His Majesty the Emperor and King, my august sovereign, has accepted the proposal of the imperial and royal minister of commerce, to open at Vienna, in the spring of the year 1873, an international exposition of products of agriculture, industry, and the fine arts.

I have received the order to inform you of this, Mr. Secretary of State, and to beg you to be pleased to bring this plan to the notice of the proper United States authorities, requesting them to contribute to the success of this enterprise, which is calculated to develop commercial and industrial relations between this country and Austria.

I shall not fail, Mr. Secretary of State, to furnish you, from time to time, with detailed statements regarding the manner of carrying out this design.

Finally, I beg you to have the kindness to inform me how far the Government of the United States is prepared to receive it favorably; and to accept the renewed assurances of my very high consideration.

LEDERER.

Is that any warmer than this of the President, which allow me again to repeat, for I know it must be pleasing to the ear of Senators who have this exhibition at heart:

And in behalf of this Government and people I cordially commend them to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein.

In the interest of peace, civilization, domestic and internal friendship and intercourse, I commend the celebration.

Now, who says the President did not go to the verge of the law, and did not go as far as diplomatic propriety required? He went as far as the dignity of the United States required him to go; beyond that would involve obligations he could not fulfill.

Again, here is the second and only other document sent to us on behalf of Vienna:

NOVEMBER 10, 1871.

Mr. SECRETARY OF STATE: Referring to the note which I had the honor to address you on the 22d of September, 1871, I hasten herewith to send you six copies of the programme for the international exposition which will be opened at Vienna on the 1st day of May, 1873, and a like number of copies of the classification and of the list of members of the imperial and royal commission.

I have just been directed to express to you, Mr. Secretary of State, the hope that the Government of the United States will be pleased to appoint, as it did for the expositions at London and Paris, as soon as possible, a commission charged to make the necessary arrangements for the participation of its citizens.

I beg you, Mr. Secretary of State, to have the kindness to inform me of the measures which the Government of the United States, according to the kind assurances contained in your note of October 6, will think proper to take in this matter.

I avail myself at the same time of the present occasion to reiterate to you, Mr. Secretary of State, the assurances of my very high consideration.

LEDERER.

If there is anything in this document which goes beyond what I have already read and reread, emanating from the Secretary of State in obedience to our statute, I should like to have some Senator point it out.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will permit me I will point it out. They both ask the appointment of commissioners. The President's proclamation does not.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill you propose to pass does not. What do you say to that?

Mr. SCOTT. An invitation is sent. Of course it is to appoint commissioners.

Mr. SARGENT. That is still another invitation. The Senator, intending to be ingenuous, really did not intend by his argument in favor of this bill to prepare a way for commissioners, and consequently his suggestion is irrelevant. The bill, on the contrary, endeavors to quicken the pulse of the Government in the form of the invitation that shall be sent. Our phrase is too diplomatic, too courtly, to only commend in the interest of peace and civilization that which shall be done at Philadelphia, and consequently the President is requested—

To extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia under the auspices of the Government of the United States.

The corporation drops out entirely now. The $10,000,000 drop out. It is not under the auspices of a corporation in the city of Philadelphia. It is under nobody's auspices but the Government of the United States, and now for the first time it comes, and comes so strongly, that I said when I read the bill, and I said a few minutes ago, that if this bill passes, both as a Senator and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge the interests of the Government specially in that particular, I shall feel that my conscience is bound. It is a question of character, and I can hardly consider any appropriation extravagant which will properly carry out this purpose.

Under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the year 1876.

This throws down all disguises. Now the Government is to go into this business. It now ceases to be a local matter; it now ceases to be of any consequence whether a corporation exists or not, or whether the city of Philadelphia wants its memorial art building for a perpetual record kept there and its funds devoted to that purpose. The Treasury of the United States is the cow that is to be milked; it is to be squeezed literally. The United States is the element which is now to be injected into the invitation; all is to be done under our auspices and at our expense; and Senators will see that they cannot now come forward with a bill like this without admitting—although they admit it for the first time, and in answer, reluctantly, to questions, first from the able Senator from New York and then from myself, after questioning which almost amounts to cross-questioning—that this bill really does mean some millions of dollars, and that the Government must pay it.

Now, sir, I object. I object on behalf of the dignity of the American people to doing more than other nations have in inviting people to this exhibition. I say that this is unnecessary, so far as calling the attention of other countries to it. But if this is a web to be entangled about our feet, if this is a net in which the Treasury is to be caught and emptied, then it is necessary, then it is a good opening-wedge. It may be driven clear to the head, and with the strongest blows, and the Treasury opened in consequence of it.

I suppose the time has passed when we ought to consider the question whether there shall be an exhibition to which all other nations shall be invited held at Philadelphia or anywhere within the limits of the United States in 1876. It is a great pity, I must say, that that exhibition occurs in that year. It is a great pity that the one hundredth anniversary comes during the year of a presidential contest. Why, sir, it is the year of all others when we wash our dirty linen. It is the year in which we exhibit the most unlovely aspect of American polities and of the American people. It is the year of all others, during every four, when the press is most inflamed, when the minds of politicians and all others are the most excited, when men become the most vituperative, when the most innocent things on the part of our political opponents are misconstrued and misrepresented. We invite Europe to come here to witness the mill where, metaphorically, bloody noses are the order of the day; where characters are torn in tatters; where the description of Dickens's Martin Chuzzlewit if it ever is realized—and he certainly was a keen satirist and saw things, if sometimes with an excess of humor, always with abundant truth—where the caricature which Dickens saw and portrayed in Martin Chuzzlewit will be exhibited on the grandest scale in America. Martin lands from the vessel in New York and he hears the cries of the newsboys:

Which, I suppose, means the New York Sun—

"Here's the New York Rowdy Journal! Here's all the New York papers! Here's full particulars of the patriotic loco-foco movement yesterday, in which the whigs was so chawed up; and the last Alabama gouging case; and the interesting Arkansas dooel with bowie-knives; and all the political, commercial, and fashionable news. Here they are! Here they are! Here's the papers, here's the papers!"

"Here's the Sewer!" cried another. "Here's the New York Sewer! Here's some of the twelfth thousand of to-day's Sewer, with the best accounts of the markets, and all the shipping news, and four whole columns of country correspondence, and a full account of the ball at Mrs. White's last night, where all the beauty and fashion of New York was assembled; with the Sewer's own particulars of the private lives of all the ladies that were there! Here's the Sewer! Here's some of the twelfth thousand of the New York Sewer! Here's the Sewer's exposure of the Wall street gang, and the Sewer's exposure of the Washington gang, and the Sewer's exclusive account of a flagrant act of dishonesty committed by the Secretary of State when he was eight years old, now communicated, at a great expense, by his own nurse. Here's the Sewer! Here's the New York Sewer, in its twelfth thousand, with a whole column of New Yorkers to be shown up, and all their names printed! Here's the Sewer's article upon the judge that tried him, day afore yesterday, for libel, and the Sewer's tribute to the independent jury that didn't convict him, and the Sewer's account of what they might have expected if they had! Here's the Sewer, here's the Sewer! Here's the wide-awake Sewer; always on the lookout; the leading journal of the United States, now in its twelfth thousand, and still a printing off. Here's the New York Sewer!"

"It is in such an enlightened means," said a voice almost in Martin's ear, "that the bubbling passions of my country find a vent."—Dickens's Martin Chuzzlewit, pp. 155, 156.

And these bubbling passions are most active during a presidential campaign. Of course that is a caricature. And yet will anybody look back two or three years ago, when the fight was between Mr. Greeley on one side and General Grant on the other, speaking in ordinary parlance, and do we not all remember column upon column of billingsgate, of refuse, of which this is hardly a caricature? Mad passions get excited and run away with men; no man's character is safe at that time. I say, in 1876 we exhibit the most unlovely aspect of ourselves during the four years; and from April to October, if I have the dates correctly, during the time when this excitement runs highest, when these bubbling passions, as the American citizen said to Martin, are most effervescent, we invite all nations to come here and observe the beauty of our institutions; hear us glorify ourselves; hear us talk on the 4th of July of our grand institutions, of the glories that cluster around the American name, of the purity of our form of government, of our admirable administration of national affairs; and then on the 5th day of July, and from that on until November, to arraign every man in office, and every man out of office who seeks to get in, as a scoundrel of the deepest dye; so that a foreigner who takes up any political paper will find there slanders of the most hideous character against political opponents on one side or the other, it matters not which, all mixed up in one seething caldron of defamation, of spite, of lies, and of mischief.

Now, sir, I wish to God, if these foreigners come here, it could be the year before or the year after. It should have been the year before, before the passions were excited, or the year after, when they had subsided; because, really, there is very much that is commendable in the American people, even in their political opinions and movements, and even in their political rivalries; and there is very much that is enterprising and commendable in the press. But these disorders run riot on an occasion like this, and therefore it is badly chosen, and I add that as another reason to those given by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I perhaps can do so more freely than he can, why this time is ill chosen, and this ought not to be made the occasion of inviting all nations here.

I have talked at much greater length than I intended, Mr. President; but I look upon this as the last moment, the last opportunity in this or any future discussion on this subject, when we can protect the Treasury. If this bill is passed, the only question after that is how much money is needed, and to give it with the best grace. I shall yield; I shall capitulate to my amiable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] if this bill passes. I may sometimes think that we are extravagant, that when we have reached the twentieth million this is really too much—that my worst forebodings are realized. If it comes up to $25,000,000, I rather think I shall growl; but I certainly cannot object to $3,000,000, I cannot object to five; I cannot object up to the limit of seventeen and a half millions, which was the cost of the Vienna exhibition. Up to that point, for one, I must consider myself committed; and I take occasion to say now that, if this bill passes, the honor of Congress is involved, not simply to the projectors of this celebration, but to the nations of the earth, to expend this amount to make the warm, gushing invitation which we shall issue be realized in the feast which we shall set before them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, undoubtedly the exposition of 1876 is to come off. It will certainly be held, and it ought to be held. It would be discreditable to us as a nation if in one hundred years we cannot have a national exposition of the fruits of our industry, genius, and talent. The only question is now, shall it be a success or a failure? My own impression is, that if it is to go on under present auspices it will be a failure; and in order to rescue it from that position, I propose the following amendment to the bill now pending. I move to strike out in the bill on line 3, after the word "extend," all to and including the word "exposition," on line 6; and to insert what I send to the Chair. I ask that the bill be read as it would then appear with the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont offers an amendment by way of perfecting the bill, before the vote is taken on the substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts, which will be reported.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is to strike out from the word "extend," in line 3, to the word "exposition," in line 6, the words "in the name of the United States a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition;" and in lieu thereof to insert "respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of each one of the United States to be represented and take part in the national exposition;" so as to make the bill read:

That the President be requested to extend a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of each one of the United States to be represented and take part in the national exposition to be held at Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the year 1876.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, this reduces the magnificent scale upon which this exposition is to take place, from an international to simply a national exposition. If we are to have an international exposition, it ought to be at New York. There foreign governments would be introduced to our country through one of the most magnificent bays, not even excepting the Bay of Naples, that the world possesses. And if held there, there are sufficient accommodations for a cloud of visitors. But let such a crowd as ought to appear at an international exhibition upon the formal invitation of the Government come to Philadelphia, and how can they be accommodated? Five thousand would exhaust all their hotel accommodations; and if this is to be a success, we ought to have at least ten thousand visitors a day to attend it for months and months in succession.

Then again, Mr. President, the encouragement of our people to attend a national exposition would be far greater than it possibly could be to attend an international one. Patriotic impulses would kindle the enthusiasm of our people. At an international exposition the articles exhibited from abroad would be almost exclusively the work of skilled hands; and it is undeniable that in this country in point of skilled labor we are at present behind the European nations. They have not only had an experience of a thousand years, but there labor is valued at so much less than labor is here per day that they can afford to expend a larger amount of time upon articles of art and other products of superior excellence than we can. It is true that we are rapidly progressing, and if we wait until 1880 we shall unquestionably be much better prepared for an international exposition than we shall be in 1876. Every day we shall have less and less to fear from competition. I do, however, desire to see congregated at Philadelphia, which is eminently the place for a national exhibition because it is a city of larger manufactures in proportion to its size than any other in the country, such products as can be contributed from all parts of our Union. If we do this, I feel sure of a display of which we shall not be ashamed.

But, sir, I am somewhat surprised by the exposition made by the Senator from California in relation to this matter. Clearly the State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia, if that Senator is not mistaken, have managed this business somewhat craftily, to say the least of it. They appear to have so managed that, if the Government of the United States now shall contribute or furnish funds to its success, and there shall be any loss in consequence, the whole loss, or the chief part, will be thrown upon the Government of the United States. The contributions made by Pennsylvania and by Philadelphia, according to the statement of the Senator from California, appear to be confined to an art gallery, or a memorial hall, which is to remain there after this international exposition shall have closed. If that is to be the case, it is manifest not only that the Government of the United States will be reluctant to contribute anything, but that other States will be reluctant to contribute anything, and for the same reason. This does not come up to the bold and generous manifesto made by the representatives of Pennsylvania and Philadelphia. They, perhaps improperly, assumed at the outset that they wanted no money from the Government of the United States, and that they would bear the whole expense. I do not think it would be proper for the State of Pennsylvania or the city of Philadelphia to bear the whole expense. I should be perfectly willing to contribute any reasonable amount on the part of the United States to insure the success of this measure as a national exposition; but whenever any money shall be contributed for that end, I shall insist that the money contributed by Pennsylvania and by Philadelphia shall go into the same treasury, be appropriated to the same object, and subject to the same profit and loss.

But, sir, as I said in the outset, I do think that a national exhibition here in our own country in 1876 is a reasonable and proper thing to be provided for, and I shall be willing, so far as my vote is concerned, to do anything that is proper in order to insure success, and a great success; but there is nothing in the future more certain than that this is to be a stupendous failure as an international exhibition. We may invite large numbers, but they will not come.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the amendment? Let it be read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania, who usually sits at my right, but who is not now in his seat, [Mr. CAMERON,] will accept the amendment which I propose. He assured me that he would.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out the words, "in the name of the United States a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition;" and in lieu of these words to insert "a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of each one of the United States to be represented and take part in the national exposition."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. SCOTT. My colleague, who has charge of this bill, I thought was in the Chamber a moment ago, and I shall call for a division on the amendment for the purpose of having him in the Chamber. As the Senator from Vermont has stated that he has his assent to this amendment, I do not wish it to be acted upon in his absence. Moreover, if there is no other Senator wishing to take the floor on this question, I have some things to say in reply to the Senator from California; but I do not wish to occupy time now if other Senators desire to speak upon the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. An objection occurs to me, that by changing the name here the result may be to impair the subscriptions already made by private individuals. Certain persons have subscribed to an international exposition, which has a definite meaning, and, if we now change the name and apparent object of this exhibition, they may refuse to pay their subscriptions. I submit to Senators whether this amendment will not defeat every appropriation that has already been made, every subscription that has been made by any individual, by changing the name and designation of this corporation. It has been incorporated as an international exposition, and to carry out that purpose $1,500,000 have been subscribed by individual citizens; and the State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia have made conditional subscriptions. Now, if Congress changes the name and object and designation of this corporation, the result may be to discharge every one who has subscribed to it. I submit that consideration to the Senators who are interested in this matter. I do not say how I will vote upon it. I am informed that $1,500,000 have been subscribed to this corporation in the nature of stock, payable in money it is true, but still in the nature of stock liable to assessment. This change of the name, designation, and objects of the corporation will undoubtedly discharge all these private subscriptions.

Mr. CAMERON. I should be glad to have the amendment read.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I thought I could accept that proposition; but as it reads now I cannot. I think it would lose to us all the subscriptions we have already obtained. As I understand it, the State of Pennsylvania and its people have subscribed $3,500,000. I am very sorry that I cannot accept the amendment; but it would change the whole character of the exposition—if that word will suit the Senator from Massachusetts; I would rather have some other myself, but he understands words better than I do—and would prevent us from receiving the money which has already been subscribed. I will say, however, that the gentlemen who have this matter in charge have assured me that, under no circumstances, will they ask or receive from the Government more than $3,000,000. They will not ask a dollar during the present fiscal year, and they will only ask that money be paid as we pay from the State of Pennsylvania and from other States an equal sum of money.

I thought the amendment related merely to the mere name or form. I do not care whether it be called a State exhibition, or a United States exhibition, or an international one. To my mind there is not much difference in the terms. The people of the United States are going to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of their existence as a nation. They invite the whole world to come and see them. If the people of any part of the world come, they will be treated kindly and liberally, and with all the hospitality that we can extend. If they do not come, there will be no harm done to us, and we shall not complain. I am sorry that I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senators from Pennsylvania of course are the best judges of what they want. It seems to be almost the universal sentiment outside of Pennsylvania, I believe, that if this is to go on under the term of an international exhibition it will be a failure, while it might be a success if it was a national exhibition.

The Senator from Ohio, by what warrant I fail to perceive, declares that if this amendment is adopted, persons who have subscribed to stock in Philadelphia for the international exhibition will thereby be absolved from all their subscriptions. Why, sir, this bill does not refer to any act that has passed heretofore. It merely empowers the President to do, what? To extend an invitation to foreign nations. My modification is that he shall extend an invitation to the States. How is that to absolve anybody from any subscriptions to any stock company in the world? It seems to me that it is an utter absurdity to claim that this bill, which only proposes to extend an invitation to foreign nations, will relieve the stockholders of the company when it shall be modified merely to give invitations to the several States. I trust that no Senator will be frightened by that idea, even if it were true, for if the Senator from California is not mistaken, those subscriptions are merely for a private, separate, and independent purpose, namely, to establish and build a memorial hall or an art gallery that is to remain upon the ground after this exposition shall have taken place; so that if in fact the effect of the amendment proposed by me were to be precisely what it is represented, it would have no effect to alarm me in relation to the propriety of its adoption. The Government of the United States, as I understand it, if they contribute under the present subscriptions that have been made, are to stand the entire loss or gain of the exposition. But, sir, I should regard it as discreditable to our country if we should not have a successful exhibition in 1876, and it seems to me clear that there can be no success unless we attempt that, and nothing more.

Mr. SCOTT. I have already said that before this debate is closed I desire to make some reply to the statements of the Senator from California. I do not rise to reply to them now, but to call attention to the terms of the original bill, to satisfy the Senator from Vermont that the amendment which he now proposes is entirely unnecessary, and will accomplish no more than that which is already in the bill. The original bill provides for the appointment of two commissioners, to be nominated by the governors of the several States and appointed by the President; so that every State in the Union is already represented in the centennial commission by the commissioners appointed by the governors of the States. The commission is organized; and thus in effect the invitation has already been extended to, and accepted by, every State in the Union. Now, again, to go through the formality of extending an invitation to States that are already represented by commissioners, it seems to me would be calculated, even if not intended by the mover of it, to bring this bill into almost contempt by repeating what we have done heretofore.

Let me say further that the Senator from Vermont is anticipating altogether what is not before us. It is taken for granted that if this bill be passed there will be an appropriation asked. Let that be so, let that be taken for granted; but the terms of that appropriation we are not considering now. If any Senator here, or if all the Senators here, desire that the Government shall take stock in this corporation, certainly nobody interested in the centennial exposition will say no to it, so that the Government shall have every opportunity of participating in the profits as well as in sharing in the losses, if there be any. Indeed, there can hardly be any terms proposed with reference to the security of the money and the supervision of the money, that is to be appropriated by the General Government, that would not be accepted by the honest and honorable business men who have charge of this transaction.

The question of whether it is to be a national exhibition or an international exhibition is properly before the Senate; for if this invitation be extended to foreign governments of course we expect it to be an international exhibition. Upon that question permit me to say to the Senator from Vermont that the Senators from Pennsylvania, apart from the local interest which their people feel in the character of the exhibition, feel that their character and their honor are no more involved than those of the Senators of any other State in the Union. If the Congress of the United States, under the circumstances, looking at all that has been done, and looking at the invitations which have been accepted, think the time has arrived when we should withdraw what has been accepted as an invitation, withdraw from what may be considered as an awkward predicament, let the responsibility rest upon the Congress of the United States for doing so. We have endeavored to present it here, not by any craftiness either upon the part of Pennsylvania or Philadelphia or any of our people, but in the desire to have it fairly understood, intelligently considered, and decided as becomes the honor and dignity of a great nation; and let that decision be what it may, we shall feel that we have done our duty in presenting it to Congress in the light in which we view it. I do not and I will not permit myself to anticipate the remarks which I propose to make in reply to some things which have been said, that at least insinuate that Pennsylvania and Philadelphia have been engaged in a business which is derogatory to the character of either of them. I shall have something to say upon that subject before the debate closes, as I understand there are other Senators who desire now to speak upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely desire to say that the bill as it now stands emphasizes the fact that this is to be an international exhibition. Desirous as I am for its success, I wish to change it merely to a national exhibition.

Mr. STOCKTON. I do not rise to speak upon the bill, but to make a suggestion simply in reference to the amendment. I may say if this question were presented here for the first time, the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont would have great force with me. I do not say that it has not as it is; but I desire to call his attention to the fact that an international exhibition was authorized under the auspices of the United States, and certain invitations, or partial invitations of some kind, such as were taken to be invitations, were given to foreign governments to join in an international exhibition. The Legislatures of several States, I think, have instructed their Senators and requested their members to advocate this international exhibition. The Legislature of my own State since this debate has commenced has appropriated $100,000 as a State subscription to this international exhibition, which I presume is a law at this moment.

Now a bill is introduced, the whole object of which is, judging from its face, without a regard to what may be presumed will follow it, to authorize the President of the United States to make that quasi invitation which, by a singular circumstance or misunderstanding, has already been given, a cordial, earnest, and respectful invitation. That being the whole object of this bill, when that is before us, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is that the President of the United States be authorized to invite the States, some of whom have already subscribed $100,000, and who have been invited, who are part of it—to invite them to what? To the national celebration. Where is there any national celebration? Has Congress authorized any national celebration? Has anybody ever heard of any national celebration to be held in 1876?

Even supposing that the Senate should be of the opinion that we had better have had this originally a national and not an international celebration; supposing the Senate should be of the opinion that it is better now to change it, my suggestion is that the amendment as worded in altering that act not only, as was stated by a Senator on the other side of the Chamber, is of no use, as inviting parties who are a part of it, parties who have been invited already, but it applies to nothing whatever, because there is no such celebration which Congress has authorized, nor has anybody suggested, until this debate arose, that there should be any; and before we authorize the President to invite States, or anybody else, to a national celebration of that event, we ought in some way to ascertain the fact that there is to be one, or we ought to authorize this company by changing its title to change itself from an international society of exhibitors to a society for a national exhibition.

I simply wished to call the attention of the Senate to the effect of the amendment. There are many persons, I think, who agree with the Senator from Vermont, that it would have been much better in the beginning to have concluded to celebrate the natal day of our nation by a national rather than an international exhibition; but I cannot vote for the amendment as it comes before us now, because I cannot see that it applies to anything or has any definite meaning.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Vermont that there can be no doubt, in my judgment, that the legal effect of this proposition, if it is followed by an appropriation for a national exposition, is to discharge every subscription of stock to the international exposition. Why, sir, it is the ordinary case of a corporation charter to construct a railroad, say from New York to Philadelphia. If it should be subsequently changed to a corporation to construct a railroad from New York to Trenton, the subscriptions under the previous charter could not be enforced to build the shorter road. It is an ordinary case which may occur; and I have known changes of the kind. Any change of the plan, name, organization, or object of a corporation, will prevent the collecting of subscriptions that have been made for the previous corporation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator refers to some subsequent act making an appropriation as being possible; and yet this bill, so far as it is concerned, does not refer to any previous act or anything that has been done. It only proposes to give an invitation. I propose to confine that invitation, so that the celebration shall be a national instead of an international one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I agree perfectly, so far as this particular bill is concerned, that it would not have much effect. This bill is simply intended to commit Congress to take charge of this international exposition and pay the expenses of it. I understand that perfectly. Whether I will vote for it or not I will determine after I hear the arguments upon it. But there is no doubt at all, if this law is to be followed by appropriations to carry it into effect, and those appropriations are made for a national, and not an international exposition, the two being distinct and different, different objects, the effect would be to discharge those who have subscribed to the original corporation created by the law, with the purposes defined by law. I am told, by a member from Pennsylvania, that subscriptions to the amount of $1,500,000 have been made by citizens of Pennsylvania alone to the stock of the corporation created by Congress. Certainly if there is any change like this, to be followed hereafter by appropriations to a national exposition, these stockholders may come in and say, "We subscribed to the stock of an international exposition; we do not choose to pay to this one."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Does the Senator understand that those subscriptions are made for this exposition or merely for a memorial hall?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand distinctly that the subscriptions made for the memorial hall are made by the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania. But the subscriptions made by private individuals are to the stock of a company chartered by Congress, in which they agree to pay so much money. Perhaps the Senator from Pennsylvania can explain it.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator from Ohio how many subscriptions there are outside of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania?

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot say.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have been unable to find out in any paper which has been laid before us. If there are any I should like to hear it.

Mr. SCOTT. Upon the point stated by the Senator from Ohio, let me call attention briefly to the act of incorporation of the centennial board of finance, so that Senators can judge for themselves the effect which this amendment, and an appropriation following it, would have, if the board of finance, the corporation, were to proceed to enforce these subscriptions after the character of the exhibition shall have been changed. The act begins with this preamble:

> Whereas Congress did provide, by an act entitled "An act to provide for the celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876," approved March 3, 1871, &c.

And then it proceeds to recite the further purpose of the exhibition, and then the first section, after the enacting clause, reads thus:

> That there is hereby created a body-corporate, to be known by the name of the centennial board of finance, and by that name to have an incorporate existence until the object for which it is formed shall have been accomplished.

That is, until this international exhibition shall have been held.

As I have risen upon this subject, let me say that the question of the Senator from Vermont suggests a misapprehension upon his part. The $1,500,000 subscribed by the citizens of Philadelphia and of the State is subscribed as corporate stock in this corporation, and there is no condition whatever which connects that with the building called a memorial hall. That building is to be erected by the appropriation made by the State of Pennsylvania and by the city of Philadelphia. It is to be placed under the exclusive control of the authorities controlling this centennial exhibition, and used entirely under their control for the purposes of the exhibition, and is to remain in that park as an art gallery, free forever to all persons from all portions of the United States. I do not wish to enter into any discussion as to what has been said about that subscription, but simply wish to remove the misapprehension which has been suggested as existing in the mind of the Senator from Vermont and which may exist in the minds of others.

As to the amount of the subscriptions, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Kentucky, I am not aware of any very considerable amount outside of the State of Pennsylvania. I have been informed that a certain amount, not a very large amount, was taken in the Territory of Arizona. I do not know how much that is. The Senator from New Jersey refers to an appropriation made, I believe, by the Legislature of New Jersey of $100,000. Whether that is authorized to be subscribed as stock in this corporation or not I am not aware.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is stock.

Mr. SCOTT. It is authorized to be taken as stock; but upon that whole subject of stock or other appropriations there is no reluctance whatever, I again repeat it, upon the part of those connected with this centennial exhibition, that any appropriations that are made shall be made stock. Indeed, it would be desirable that the whole of the stock should be taken in that form; and there is no intention whatever of making a request here that if there be a desire on the part of Congress that the Government shall be a stockholder that desire shall be frustrated.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont brings before the Senate the question of whether we will again reiterate that this is a national exhibition. It is made national as broadly as it can be made by two acts of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. International, you mean.

Mr. SCOTT. No; I am speaking first of its national character. It is made national by authorizing the appointment of commissioners by the President from every State in the Union and every Territory. Those commissioners are appointed. The second act of Congress, incorporating the centennial board of finance, also gave incorporators, two in every State at large and a number corresponding with the number of congressional districts, and they have been appointed; so that a national character is given to it by every feature of the bill. Then, in addition to its national character for organization and control, the international character is given to it from Alpha to Omega, in the title, in every section of it, and in the concluding section authorizing proclamation; so that the only question I think the Senate has at present to determine for the purpose of making our way clear in the future is, whether the international feature shall be stricken out of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it seems to me that we shall deny a fair hearing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont if we decide against it on the ground stated by the Senator from Ohio. He objects to it because, he says, if we should adopt it and follow it by an appropriation for a national exhibition, we should in effect dissolve the existing corporation, or at least relieve from liability subscribers to it. Let use examine this suggestion for a moment.

The purpose of the pending bill was not ill-stated by some Senator who remarked that its object was to commit the Government to defray the expenses of this occasion. It chooses in terms to enjoin upon the President to invite foreign nations to come here in the name of the United States, and there it stops. Bearing in mind, then, the very narrow and little province of the bill, let us see whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont is at all open to the objection made by the Senator from Ohio. How does the Senator propose to change it? By enjoining upon the President to invite the governments of the States to participate in a national exhibition to be held at the same time and place. Suppose we adopt this, and suppose we appropriate hereafter one or three million dollars to defray the expenses of the celebration, in what manner is any subscriber relieved from the existing corporation? Not at all. Why? Because we have not changed even in the estimation of a hair any condition-precedent. Here is a corporation entitled the centennial board of finance. To that subscriptions have been made. If it were a condition-precedent of those subscriptions, or if it were embodied in the act of incorporation that all appropriations made by Congress should go to the nourishment and maintenance of it, and then by an amendment we divert those appropriations and cast them elsewhere, well might the Senator from Ohio say that stockholders or those proposing to be such in that incorporation might be discharged.

Suppose we adopt this amendment, and suppose we do follow it by an appropriation of money to hold a national exposition, does not everything provided by this existing corporation remain precisely as it is? Two acts establish this corporation, both of which, on their face, are without recourse to the United States, both of which file a caveat, giving not only presumptive notice and constructive notice, but actual notice, to every stockholder, to every subscriber, that in no event is the Congress of the United States, or the Government of the United States, to be called upon to pay one single shilling. Now can it be said that if for the purpose of a national celebration, although at the same time and at the same place, money be appropriated, we thereby have interfered with the vested rights of the stockholders in this corporation, one of the elements in which is that under no circumstances shall the United States be liable for a farthing?

Mr. President, I do not mean at this time, reserving as carefully my declaration in that respect as my friend from Ohio has done, until I hear this matter argued, to make any statement of my views on the general question; but I do insist (and I ask Senators to observe the amendment for a moment in that view) that the Senator from Vermont is changing nobody's rights, releasing no subscriber, doing no harm, by providing that the President shall be enjoined to invite the several States to participate in the celebration of the one hundredth birthday of the nation, instead of voting for the proposition as it stands, being an invitation to foreign nations to come and participate in an international exposition at the same time. I submit there can be nothing in that; and if we want to confine our appropriations hereafter to the less cumbrous and safer action contemplated by this amendment, I think we may vote for it without the slightest trepidation in respect to consequences which it may entail beyond that hereafter.

Mr. STOCKTON. I think the Senator from New York has not stated the position of matters as it strikes my mind. I think the Senator from Ohio was right, because if this amendment of the Senator from Vermont affects at all this proposition, if it refers at all to the centennial organization already created for taking charge of the international exhibition in 1876, then it is perfectly plain that this changes the objects and purposes for which it was chartered. If it does so, beyond all kind of doubt it cannot be disputed that the subscribers are released. If it does not refer to it at all, then in order to get the benefit of any subscription given by Congress to the national society, they have got to change the character and purposes of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to understand my friend at that point. Does he mean to state to us that if by law we direct or request the President to invite the governors of the States to participate in a national exhibition on the 4th of July, 1876, at Philadelphia, we thereby in legal effect change any existing obligation so as to relinquish subscribers to the corporation known as the centennial board?

Mr. STOCKTON. I do mean to say (and that is just the point I was getting to) that when the gentlemen who are in the corporation change themselves so, by changing their name and purposes, as to receive and become the recipients of your subscription, or the bonus you give them, then they have violated the contract which they entered into with those who voted money in the State Legislatures, or who have subscribed stock. It so happens that an opinion covering that very ground was read this morning, in reference to a railroad question, in the Supreme Court. I do not understand that the Senator from New York and myself and the Senator from Ohio differ on the question of law, and that is the reason I do not discuss it; but I say that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont does not refer to this existing society at all; it refers to another; it refers to a national exhibition, a thing which does not exist. Therefore it can do no harm; it cannot violate the contract. But if you appropriate money to a national celebration, and these parties come in and receive that money, they have deprived their subscribers of the chance of making that money which they might have made by an exhibition of foreign goods. You have changed the whole scheme of their exhibition. You do not change it, I admit—the Senator from New York is perfectly right in his statement to that extent—by passing this amendment to this bill; but if they mean to make but one exhibition, and that one is to become national, which are the only terms on which this amendment suggests we are willing to make a subscription, then it is changed by their accepting it; and there cannot be a clearer case in the world, it seems to me. I think the Senator from New York will agree himself that by that change you lose the power to compel the payment of the calls when the scheme for which the subscription was made has changed its nature and character.

The Senator, I think, made this mistake: he said that because we had no right, or the subscribers to this stock had no right, to expect a subscription from Congress, Congress could subscribe this money to any society it pleased, and the stockholders had no right to complain. That is perfectly true; but still if, in order to get this money, they change the nature and character of the undertaking, then it seems to me perfectly plain that they have no longer the power in law to receive the calls which become due on the stock subscribed on their original subscription.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from New Jersey brings us now a long step nearer to the actual point. I think he came very near stating it exactly as I should contend for it. This is the state of the case: citizens of Pennsylvania and other States have obtained from the Congress of the United States what, for convenience, I will call a charter, incorporating them to hold an international exposition; they have received subscriptions to their stock. If they fail entirely to execute their corporate purposes, if they do not go on and hold this exposition or take appropriate preliminary steps thereto, undoubtedly they fall within the line of decisions to which the Senator has adverted. Why? Because they have forfeited their charter by their own action or non-action; not because now Congress shall choose, if it does choose, to appropriate money to hold a national celebration at the same time and the same place. I think we may very clearly discern from this that the purpose of the advocates of this bill is to enable, by dint of appropriations coming from Congress, this corporation to go on and execute its duties and maintain its rights; and that is all there is of it; and there the ways part. This amendment goes in one direction; the bill goes in the other. The bill, as it stands, is designed to enable this corporation to succeed in what it proposes to do, and to have the United States foot the bill. It means that they shall go on and attempt now what has been denominated a world's fair, that they shall invite every tribe and tongue to cross a trackless sea and bring their wares for exhibition on the 4th of July, 1876, and for months afterward, in the city of Philadelphia; and that the United States, first and last and all the time, not only as surety and indorser, but as principal, shall pay the bill. That is what this means. Why not say so?

The Senator from Vermont means by his amendment that if we are going to participate still further in this, now for the time being we confine our action to an invitation, to be sent out to the governments and people of the States, to assemble on the 4th of July, 1876, at Philadelphia, to celebrate, in such mode as may be adopted, the natal day of the nation on its one hundredth recurrence. Therefore my honorable friend fron New Jersey proves, as I conceive, and he proves only, that if, because they are unable to obtain appropriations from Congress, the managers of this corporation fail to execute their duties, or, to employ his word, change what they have undertaken to do, they will release their subscribers. No doubt of it. But this amendment does not direct them one way or the other; it leaves them as free as the air they breathe to go on and do precisely what they undertook to do, namely, hold this celebration or exposition, without in any way calling upon the United States to expend one farthing, whatever the peradventure or contingency might be. That is the nomination in their bond; that is what the stockholders all subscribed to. There we propose to leave it; and until an amendment of that charter is suggested, until something to cut up or unsettle vested rights is proposed, I maintain that our action has no influence whatever upon the rights or the duties legally of the managers of this corporation.

So, I say again, I shall vote for this amendment upon its merits, and vote for it as a thing wholly aloof from the question whether these corporators or managers are able to perform or whether they fail to perform what they have contracted to do.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I did not rise to speak about the merits of this amendment; I had already stated that it struck me as a very wise suggestion; but I intimated to the Senator from Vermont that he was not carrying out his object and intention. Then observing that the point was being pressed upon the Senate on one side that the centennial society would lose the benefit of any future subscription or appropriation that might be made by Congress if they took it, because if they took it they would free their subscribers, I rose to give the weight of my thought on the subject to the fact that they would not benefit by anything that Congress could do or might do for them, without freeing the subscribers to this stock. That that is a technical difficulty which may be got rid of I do not deny; but I do insist that this amendment put in in this way at the present time on this bill is inappropriate and applies to nothing; and any appropriation made on top of it will put the gentlemen who have been incorporators in this society in a legal dilemma, in which no person, I suppose, wishes that they shall be placed.

In reference to the change of the character of this exhibition I do not mean to insist, as I said when I first rose, that it would not have been much wiser to celebrate the anniversary of the birth of this nation by a national gathering of our own people. I do not mean to say, and did not say, that it would not be wiser to do it yet. That is a question of some little delicacy on which I desire to hear other gentlemen speak before I make up my mind. I do not think that is effected by this amendment, and I cannot see the application of the amendment at all.

While I see perfectly well, and it has been frankly avowed by gentlemen who advocate this bill, that after this bill is passed it is expected that an appropriation will be asked for, yet at the same time it is a part, as stated by the Senator from New York himself, of this charter that they are to have no appropriation from Congress. The charter does not say that, if Congress choose to assist the exhibition and make an appropriation, they are forbidden from taking it; but it is no part of the vested right of any man who subscribed to that stock that he should share in any future appropriation of Congress. He has no vested right in that, but he has the vested right technically, poor as it may be, miserable as it may be, with no results, to hold the corporators to the scheme which they set out to perform, and therefore the suggestion we make is not against the merits of this amendment; it is simply that if the corporators are forced into the position of sticking to the original purpose that Congress, as well as these gentlemen, had in view, and we are going to make an appropriation for another and a different purpose, these parties cannot benefit by it without losing the original subscriptions they made under a different state of facts; and it was to bring before the Senate, before a vote was taken on this amendment, that precise condition of things that I rose; and the Senator from New York does not differ with me.

I think it will be a mistake to vote for this amendment as it is now introduced on this bill. I think it means nothing whatever. Although there may be an appropriation to follow it, it is, as I said, in itself nothing but a bill to authorize the President of the United States to invite the princes, potentates, and powers to come and assist in this feast. Now, if we do not want to invite them, do not do it, and do not pass the bill. If you do not want to invite the princes, potentates, and powers of the world to come and celebrate the natal day of this nation, why is it necessary for you to convert such a proposed invitation into a direction to the President of the United States to ask the States that have already subscribed, and are members of this corporation, to take part in a national exposition? If you want a national exhibition, bring up a bill for a national exhibition; if you want to subscribe to it, introduce an appropriation for the purpose of subscribing to it; but why this amendment should be put on this bill, where it has no possible business, I cannot imagine. In other words, any person who votes for the amendment ought to be willing to vote against the bill, because if you do not want to invite anybody, all you have to do is not to pass the bill. There is no necessity of inviting the States; for, as I said, they have been invited before, and have, some of them, become members of the corporation; and, as was said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, there are commissioners appointed by the States who are a part of this institution as it now exists.

I had no intention at this moment of discussing the merits of the bill or giving an opinion on the propriety of changing it. I preferred to listen and hear what other gentlemen said. It was a matter of delicacy, and I wished to advise myself on the subject. My sole object was to show, what struck me so clearly, that the adoption of this amendment would not have the effect which was intended, and that without putting difficulties, without putting obstructions, in the way of having the exhibition at all, or of making it national if that is thought best, we ought to reject this amendment. If the good taste of the Senate and of the people, upon a little consideration, thinks that we had better make it national, be it so; but if we come to that conclusion, we do not want to put the gentlemen who are engaged in this matter into a dilemma; we do not want to have a difficulty with those who have been subscribing to the stock; we do not want to have an appropriation from Congress made to another institution while the present corporation is in existence and struggling along. There is no object in that; and therefore the proper plan is to have a resolution that this exhibition shall be called a national exhibition, and that on condition that it is changed to that we will appropriate such and such a sum, whatever may be deemed fit, and then have also a clause that it shall be under the auspices of the United States, and have a clause if you choose that the President shall assign an officer of the Army, of experience and talent, to take charge and make it a success. All these things may be done, done directly, done wisely possibly. If that is deemed in the best taste, let us do it in that way. But do not attempt to tack on to a bill to invite the other governments of the world, especially after the little matter of delicacy that has already occurred in reference to these invitations, an amendment by which the President is to do, asked to do, such a simple thing, a thing which is so entirely inappropriate, as inviting the States to a feast to which they are already invited.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey claims that he does not apprehend the meaning of this amendment, and then proceeds to say that it means nothing. I will endeavor to state what my meaning was in introducing the amendment. It was as a friend of the exhibition of 1876; and if those who advocate this bill believe otherwise, they may go farther and fare worse.

The meaning of this amendment is to save at least $10,000,000 to the Treasury of the United States. What is the purport of this bill? It is to extend an invitation to all nations to appear here in 1876. Is it to be supposed that we are to invite every foreign nation to a feast and then provide nothing for it? It is indicated by those who advocate this bill that they are coming here for an appropriation. If they are coming here for an appropriation, if it is a proper one, I mean to vote for it. But the question is whether it would not be cheaper for the United States to undertake and carry on the whole expense of a national exhibition rather than to carry on the supplementary part of an international one. I think we could do it, and do it for $10,000,000 less than we can to carry on the international exhibition.

This bill has no other purpose than to commit us to an international exposition. My purpose is to rob it of that meaning and to place upon it a meaning which I can understand, and that is to have a national exhibition; and that is the whole of it.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I cannot vote for this amendment, because, if it is adopted, the bill will be of no earthly account or use. It should be, then, voted down, for it is not necessary—has no connection, and no pertinence to this business—as was stated by the Senator from New Jersey. If the Senator from Vermont had moved to strike out the word "international" and insert "national," so as to authorize the President to invite other governments to be present at our national exhibition, not to take part particularly—an amendment that might have been framed to make the exhibition national instead of international—then we might have voted for it; but to merely authorize the President to invite the governors of the States, which are now fully represented in this intended celebration, is perfect surplusage, and to my mind it is ridiculous.

Why, Mr. President, the governor of New Hampshire is now one of the commissioners, and I think one of the finance committee in this undertaking; and to authorize the President to invite him, who is now a part and parcel of this exhibition, so far as it has already proceeded, is simply surplusage and a ridiculous performance. If we are opposed to this bill, let us vote it down squarely, and not make it ridiculous by any such amendment as this.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I agree very much with the suggestions made by the Senator from New Jersey and those of the Senator from New York, and yet also I must confess to some extent those of the Senator from New Hampshire; and I am driven to this incongruous agreement by the utterly anomalous condition in which we are placed here by this attempt at a peculiar species of legislation. This bill is here under false pretenses. It is not a straightforward, manly reaching out at what is intended to be accomplished. If the corporation which has been created for the purpose of taking charge of the finances of the centennial commission had come directly to us and asked for an appropriation of $10,000,000, and the good faith of this Government had been truly pledged to an international exhibition, I would have voted for the appropriation; but to come here in this way with a bill to get the President to invite foreign potentates to come here and witness our glorification of republican institutions, for the purpose of committing us, to begin with, to that international exhibition, and then subsequently let the appropriation slip in under other bills—this, I think, places the Senate in a position in which we need not be surprised at any incongruous and anomalous amendments.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to do justice to his own State?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I feel that it is due to it at this time. The president of the centennial commission is an honored Representative in the other House from the State of Connecticut, and when this bill was introduced into the House, and under discussion there, he did freely, without equivocation, and boldly announce to the House of Representatives that this bill was the precursor of an appropriation bill; that it meant money, and that an appropriation bill would be asked for. That, I think, is due to General HAWLEY, of Connecticut.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I have a very high respect for General HAWLEY, to whom the Senator has referred, and for no characteristic of his have I a higher respect than his straightforward, manly frankness in doing that which he wants to do, and I have no doubt that he felt himself, or would feel himself, unable to sustain a bill of this character if he knew that under it was hidden the contemplation of a future appropriation of money without saying so in the outset.

But we have had the several acts of Congress which have been passed in reference to this subject-matter read before us here during the progress of the present discussion, and I do say that no man can shut his eyes so tight as not to see that there has been all the while an attempt, since 1871, to commit the Government of the United States to an international exhibition, while, at any rate until General HAWLEY announced the contrary, there has all the while been a studied assertion that the Government never should be called upon to pay a cent.

Now, sir, we have got to the point where we must go one way or the other. We have got to say that we will undertake this ridiculous business of an international exhibition in 1876, or this most appropriate business of a national exhibition. Sir, I stand among the foremost here and everywhere in calling upon this Government to celebrate its one hundredth anniversary all over the land. Hold, if you please, your central exhibition in Philadelphia, whence went forth the Declaration of Independence; but all over this land, in every village, in every township, along every valley, and on every mountain side, let our people celebrate the one hundredth year since the nation had its birth. But, sir, for God's sake, let us have our one hundredth celebration at home here to ourselves.

What are we going to do? The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] stood here on Friday and most nobly and eloquently discanted on the great deeds which were done on that day, nearly a hundred years ago, when republican institutions were born, from whence they went out to go triumphantly all over the world. From his glowing language you might well prophesy that within another centennial all kings and potentates and royal dynasties would be crumbled to the dust before the irresistible march of republican institutions; and in the next breath he wants us to have our President invite the kings and potentates and royal dynasties of Europe to come here the year after next and have us tell them so! Let us show a little good taste; let us not ask a man into our house, and then not only insult him with our lips, but kick him, too! No, sir.

I am in favor of a home exhibition of American industry on this day of our centennial. And I am in favor of the greatest celebration of the 4th of July on that day that the continent has ever seen. But, sir, I want, and upon this bill too, now that the opportunity is made, now that the word ought to be spoken, an end to be put by the Senate forever to this sheer humbug of an international exposition during the summer of 1876, at Philadelphia; and because the amendment of the Senator from Vermont affords me the opportunity of meeting this direct point of this question fairly, and of treating both centennial commission and the centennial finance corporation fairly and frankly, as I ought to treat them; to tell them what they may expect and what they may not expect; because this opportunity is afforded upon this amendment I vote for it; and if the amendment shall be carried, the Senators from Pennsylvania, members of the commission and of the corporation, will understand what is the intent of the Senate; will understand from this discussion that we are prepared to give them, at their goodly city, on the 4th of July, 1876, or during the summer of 1876, a home exhibition of home art and industry, displaying the altitude to which we have risen in all things that constitute civilization in a hundred years from our natal day; a day of shaking of hands; a day of congratulations with each other; a day when the North and the South shall come together and bury forever every bloody memory; a day when the East and the West shall forget that they have conflicting financial interests, and shall unitedly join in ascribing to the fathers the merit that belongs to them; and in giving thanks to the God of our fathers for the goodly heritage which they left to us.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, there are undoubtedly in the question before us, arising not so much now as in the past, complications which we cannot disguise, and which we ought frankly to meet. The proposition substantially presented by the Senator from Vermont is this: Will we change the attitude we held out to the American people and to the world as our purpose in the act of 1871, of holding an international exhibition, and hold a national exhibition? That is the purport of that proposition.

It is said that there are difficulties about that, arising from the pledges which have been made on the part of the Government of the United States, and further difficulties arising out of the action of Philadelphia, relying upon the attitude assumed by the Government of the United States. One general fact is apparent to us now, and that is, whatever expectations were created by the congressional act of 1871 it is clear are no longer the expectations of to-day. Whether the responsibility for that belongs to Congress, or belongs elsewhere, it is not important for me to consider. But we are here now upon the question of inviting European powers to co-operate with us in an international exposition. We are now confronted by the fact, not then existing, which we had then no reason to believe would exist, that if that thing is done, it carries with it by necessary implication, and it carries with it beyond any disguise whatever, the fact that it involves the nation in a very large expenditure of money.

Now, Mr. President, as plain as anything can be, by the act of 1871 Congress did commit itself to an international exposition flat and square. It says so in so many words:

That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States.

And further on, in an independent section, it says:

That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expense attending such exhibition or by reason of the same.

Then clearly, so far as that act was concerned, it was a declaration on the part of Congress that the American people under its auspices shall hold an international exposition, at the same time that it explicitly declared, and probably to the satisfaction of all parties concerned at that time, that the Government itself, although it would lend its name, and its favor, and its countenance, and its protection, in no event ever would be called upon for the expenditure of a dollar of money. Now all these things are changed. It is manifest to-day that the international exhibition is a dead failure unless all that feature of this enterprise is abandoned. We have seen enough now of what took place on the other side of the water; we have seen enough of the international exhibition at Vienna to know that if Congress withdraws its protection now, this thing is necessarily by that fact an absolute and unqualified failure.

The question, then, is whether we will retrace our steps; now when we are confronted by the general fact that to go on is no longer, as declared by the act of 1871, to go on free of expense, but it is to go on with the recognized fact that we are to be involved in very large expense—how much, nobody has said, and from the nature of the case nobody can know, and, of course, nobody can say. Hence it is pertinent to inquire at this particular juncture—for taking the step now proposed we will not retrace it, we cannot retrace it, and we ought not to retrace it—and therefore this is the opportune time when the Senate of the United States must say whether it will not encounter what it did not expect to be obliged to encounter, the brunt and the expense of an international exposition, or whether it will stop here altogether, or whether, if not stopping here altogether, it will change the purpose of Congress as expressed by the act of 1871 and go for a national celebration.

It is said that if the proposition of the Senator from Vermont is adopted, it will necessarily undo a great deal that has been done on the good faith of the act of 1871 by the State of Pennsylvania, and by her patriotic and liberal-minded citizens. It is said that it would vitiate substantially the act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania of June 1, 1872, which is an act of incorporation to carry out the objects contemplated in the act of Congress of the year before.

Mr. SCOTT. The act of that date is an act of Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I am sure the argument amounts to very little. If they are both acts of Congress, then I do not see where the argument comes that the act will be vitiated. My impression was that it was an act of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. No; it was an act of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand them both to be acts of Congress. This corporation is a creature of Congress, organized to conduct an international exposition. Suppose Congress should change the purpose of the organization and declare that hereafter it should be taken as a national exhibition with the aid of Congress, undoubtedly that would be such a change in the objects of the corporation as to discharge the contracts made with the previous corporators under a different state of circumstances. Is there any doubt about that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; but my point was this: if Congress, by the act of 1871, had created certain expectations and made certain public pledges to the State of Pennsylvania, and thereupon Pennsylvania had created by her legislation a corporation upon the pledge of the Government, then of course the Government would be bound, in good faith, to proceed in the line in which it was originally proceeding; but it turns out——

Mr. SARGENT. I would remind my friend that, so far from that, the State of Pennsylvania has not subscribed one dollar to this stock as far as we can learn. It has given a million, but that is for a private work.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What I meant to say was, that if it turns out as it now turns out, that all legislation on this subject is by Congress itself, first in creating a commission, and, secondly, in creating a board of finance, the latter corporation representing ten millions of stock, which stock has not been taken up and the means of conducting the enterprise has not been secured by either act of Congress, then we are remitted to the original condition of things; we stand here to-day facing the whole question, nothing having been accomplished. The means not having been provided for holding this international exposition under either act of Congress, we are remitted to our original position, and we find ourselves to-day contemplating one of two things: either a national or an international exhibition; and in either event, clearly enough, on the Treasury of the United States all reliance, or the chief reliance, is placed for paying the bills. Now, I submit, the whole aspect of the case having been changed since 1871, very properly, at this moment we are confronted with the proposition whether we will go on and have an international exhibition, or whether we will change it to a national exhibition. And, sir, so far as expenditures are concerned, I do not understand that anybody has submitted or pretends that provision has been made for conducting either a national or an international exhibition.

One word further and I am done, because I have no speech on this subject. I am in favor of celebrating the centennial anniversary of the declaration of our national independence, and celebrating it in the most ample and generous method possible; and I am in favor now, as I was in 1871, of the Government of the United States doing it in the most direct and ample manner. Then I held that it was not wise for the Government to undertake to do indirectly what it did there attempt to do by the act of March 12, 1871; that it was an indirect method of doing things; that we should meet it then fair and square and say whether we should celebrate at Philadelphia in 1876 the Declaration of Independence, and if we came to that conclusion that we should take the matter in our own hands and make a direct appropriation out of the public Treasury; and that we should either remit the whole thing to the States, Congress acting and co-operating with the States, or take the jurisdiction of it ourselves, contemplate the paying of it out of the national Treasury, inviting the people of the States and the States themselves to co-operate.

But, Mr. President, that was not done. The other course having been pursued, it is fruitless to deny that we have got into complications by reason of the action of Congress both in 1871 and 1872. In some sense, beyond all question, the faith of this nation is pledged to the State of Pennsylvania and to the people of this country who have participated in it more or less, and to the nations abroad, that we will hold in 1876 an international exposition. It is idle to deny that complication. But at the same time it was done under circumstances which I have explained; it was done under circumstances when it was believed that having the auspices of the Government of the United States nothing further would be asked of us. I confess, looking at this whole legislation, that whether it is better to stop here and, as the Senator from Connecticut has said, insist upon a national exhibition or a national celebration to the exclusion of the international idea, ignore the steps we have taken, retrace our steps, plant ourselves to-day upon a national celebration, or whether we are to proceed, taking such precautions as we best can to provide against future expenses, is a question so troublesome that I hardly know myself what course to take.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I am very sorry that the State of Pennsylvania should be so much criticised, and even I believe censured, for a matter in which she deserves no censure at all. A few years ago the press of the country, and almost all the patriotic people of the country, looking forward to 1876, said that in consideration of our wonderful growth we ought to have a celebration of the centennial of our liberties. After awhile the question was brought here; and Congress, by a very large majority, properly, as I think, decided that that celebration should take place in Philadelphia. Philadelphia was the place where the Declaration of Independence had been signed, where it had been prepared and deliberated upon by the Continental Congress, and where the great men of this nation at that day thought it was their duty to go, as well because of their duty, as because of the great power of the State of Pennsylvania to aid in achieving the national independence. There was no other place but Boston that could compare with Philadelphia as to the propriety of the place, if we are to have a celebration at all; around no other place cluster so many revolutionary memories.

Now, this question that has been got up very recently as between a national and an international exhibition amounts only to words. What is the difference? You call it a national exhibition and the nation invites everybody belonging to the world to come here and participate with us. If you say it is international, you do the same thing. It has been called international, because other countries had given that name to expositions which they had held. England had the first, I believe, of these grand world's fairs, and France the next, and Austria the third, and all of them gave invitations to the whole world to go there to participate. Is there a citizen of the United States who, when he went to England, or to France, or to Austria, expected to have his bills paid by the government of the country to which he went? I do not believe there was one, and I know there was not one who had his bills so paid. So we shall not be expected to pay the bills of anybody who comes here. The nation invites them to participate with us in our joy over our great successes. The governments of Europe may not enjoy with us this great glory, but their people will. This country has been the asylum for the oppressed and the poverty-stricken of every part of the world. They have come to settle here because of our institutions, and they are coming here. That has made the great glory of this nation and the great prosperity of this country. So they will come again; and if they come here, they will bring with them all that they have that has been great in their achievements in the last hundred years, and they will compare them with our results; and when they come here, if they find that our institutions are better than theirs, they will settle here and become a part of our people.

It is to my mind all flummery, if I may use such a word as that, to discuss the question between a national and an international exhibition. We are going to rejoice with exceeding great joy, as I believe, over our successes; and I tell you, Mr. President, if you force it upon the people of Pennsylvania, she will have such an exhibition as will do honor to her and give shame to everybody who opposes it. The State of Pennsylvania and her people, I believe, have subscribed $3,500,000 already. By some accident in the Legislature of Pennsylvania they confined one of the millions to building a monumental edifice. I suppose that was because they were as we are; there was some doubting Thomas in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, who was afraid to make an outright, flat-footed appropriation, and he said it should be for a memorial building. I pledge my word that the Legislature, now in session, will change that, and make it an open appropriation to the centennial exhibition. There is no doubt about that. The people of Philadelphia, as a city, gave half a million in addition to the million that was subscribed by the State of Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania Railroad gave a half million, and sundry other citizens have subscribed very largely.

We do not ask this as a favor from Congress. All we ask is that you shall decide the question now and without a waste of time. If you say Philadelphia is not the place for the exhibition, let it be so said; and let those who now oppose it in after days take upon themselves the responsibility of having disgraced the country by their votes.

I do not intend to be personal in this matter, because we may well differ in our judgments; but I cannot see how any man, a member of the Senate of the United States, which started here with twenty-six members, now numbering seventy-four—all the result of our glorious institutions—should be unwilling at the end of one hundred years to come here and say, "We will meet together on the one hundredth anniversary and take each other by the hand; and, above all things, we will say to those with whom we have recently been in trouble that we forgive them and expect them to forgive us, and we will hereafter go together hand in hand and show to the world that we are the most powerful nation in the world when we are united as we are."

Why, Mr. President, I should have no objection to take the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, if I could get his vote by it, if I did not believe we should lose other appropriations which we now have. I say further, and I am authorized to say by the commissioners of this centennial exhibition, (and let me tell you that that commission is composed of two gentlemen from each State in the Union,) that they want no more than $3,000,000 from you in all; the rest will be made up; and you may put into your bill just as many restrictions as you please, confine them to that sum, and they will ask no more from you.

But do not let me be understood as begging any favor for Pennsylvania or Philadelphia. I am proud of Philadelphia, because it is the best city of the world for the poor, and the industrious, and the thrifty. There are more houses in that city than in any other city on the continent. There is more comfort there for the laboring people than there is in any other part of the world. Her police is equal to anything that has ever existed since the world began; and her manufactories are so thriving and so prosperous that every man there who will work can make himself comfortable and own his own house.

So with Pennsylvania. When the other States of the Union have been in trouble, Pennsylvania has always put out her money without stint, and her people have let their blood freely flow for the benefit of the Union. Philadelphia and Pennsylvania were selected only because it was Philadelphia in which the Declaration had been signed. Independence Hall stands there yet in which the old patriots assembled at the risk of their lives and declared themselves free and independent. And why, if we are to have a jubilee, should we not go there? If we are to rejoice, why should not it be in Philadelphia? Other cities may be jealous; but let me tell you when this Revolution began New York was in the hands of the British government, and during the whole war it was the citadel of the King of England. Boston, to be sure, shed the first blood, and there was where the cradle of liberty was rocked; but even Boston thought that Philadelphia was the place where Virginia, and Georgia, and North Carolina, and South Carolina, and all the States, could meet in one central spot and act together without jealousy. And was not Pennsylvania the first to say that the great citizen of Virginia, George Washington, should command our armies? She did; and when old John Adams made his great speech after the Declaration had been made, did not Pennsylvania rejoice in that; and has she not always stood by Massachusetts, and has she not always stood by New York? Has she not given as many men and as much money to settle up and make the great West the magnificent country it is as any other State in the Union? Are there not now six or eight representatives in this Senate who were born in Pennsylvania, from whom they received their education, and their character, and their principles; and why should she now be turned aside? Does any man here believe that if the city of New York had been selected for the place all the money-changers of that great city would not have hurraed with great joy that the people were coming there to add to their wealth? We do not want you in Pennsylvania to add to our wealth. If you come there we will treat you kindly in our old-fashioned, plain way. That is all we can do.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr President ——

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator to yield while I make a correction in figures. I received a telegram from the Secretary of the Treasury, giving some figures in relation to the reduction of the debt during the past month. I was doubtful whether it was $2,500,000 or $250,000. I now know by the debt statement before me that it was $2,590,047.45, and I simply make the correction.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this discussion. Several gentlemen about me have indicated a desire to go into executive session; and before that motion is made I simply wish to take notice of a remark made by the Senator from Connecticut which, if not noticed, may carry out to the country, perhaps, an impression which he did not intend to make. I am sorry he has left his seat. His opening remark, or very nearly his opening remark, was that this bill came here under false pretenses. A similar remark, or one similar in spirit, if not in the same words, was made by the Senator from California; and before this day's session shall close I deem it my duty to gentlemen from many States—not from the State of Pennsylvania alone—to say that there have been, and that there are, no false pretenses about this business.

The law of 1871 said upon its face that the Government was not to be responsible for any of the expenses. That was accepted, and one year afterward a board of finance was created for the purpose of raising the funds. That board of finance was constituted in good faith. The bill contained a provision which prohibited the people of Pennsylvania from taking any more than their proportion of that stock until one hundred days should have elapsed and all the other States should have had the opportunity of taking their proportions of the stock. The commissioners named in that bill, named by the Government, named by the Representatives here—not at their own solicitation—performed the duties imposed upon them, and they sent this proposal of the nation to Connecticut and to California, and to the other States of the Union, and they proposed no money for a national or an international celebration. No response came from them, so far as I know. These commissioners were proceeding to raise the money. They had raised a large amount in Pennsylvania. They had their organization completed to begin work in the other States, and it was supposed that when the appeal was directly made those States would respond. But at the time their machinery was ready to go into operation the panic intervened and that was prevented. Then, sir, they came to Congress; and when I say "they," all I will ask of any Senator on this floor is to take the list of the commissioners who compose the centennial commission and the list of gentlemen who compose the board of finance. There is not a man of them who is capable of being guilty of false pretenses. I would as soon think of charging the Senate with false pretenses as to charge the men who compose both those lists of bringing this bill here under false pretenses. They came and they stated just where they were. They had issued their proposals for plans for building; they had received those proposals; they had selected one which they believed to be proper and appropriate, and it was not selected from a Pennsylvania artist. New York had the honor of carrying off the premium for the competing plan.

Now, sir, the time approaches ——

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to interrupt him there to inquire what the estimated cost of that building is?

Mr. SCOTT. That is a question I am not able fully to answer. I desired to get that information the other evening, and shall probably have it; but I do not know now what the estimated cost of it is.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator if that building has been contracted for?

Mr. SCOTT. I am coming to that point. The commissioners had invited those proposals for plans, and had received them and accepted a plan, and after having accepted a plan, they invited proposals for building. Those proposals were received, and, I understand, they are waiting to know whether this is to be an international or a national exposition before they determine whether they can accept any proposal for the buildings. They came to Congress; they made their statement before the select committee of the other House, and before the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body. If they were guilty of any false pretenses, let the members of that committee state so here upon the floor of the Senate. My information is, although I believe I was present but for a brief time, that they laid the whole subject before these committees, and told them the point was, "Are we to have a national or an international exhibition? Let Congress declare it; relieve us, the persons who are now responsible, from this difficulty, from the dilemma in which we are, and say whether it is to be the one or the other." And when I spoke, on Friday, on this subject, I do not think I laid myself open to any charge of false pretenses as a Senator from Pennsylvania, although I see no reason why a Senator from Pennsylvania should be considered as having more interest in this than any other, for I said distinctly on this floor that whether the exposition was international or national, in the present exigency an appropriation would be asked for, and, of course, the amount will depend to a considerable extent upon whether it is the one or the other.

No, sir; there have been no false pretenses upon the part of any body, and these gentlemen only wish to be dealt with in the same spirit of candor and business honesty with which they have proposed to deal with this question.

I deem it my duty to put into this day's debate a vindication of the honor and the character of the gentlemen against whom it might be considered this charge of false pretenses had been made.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me a moment to call up a bill on the table that I wish to have passed? I move to take from the table an appropriation bill which has come from the House, for the purpose of considering it now.

CONTRACT FINANCE COMPANY, CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LUTTRELL presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, asking Congress to appoint a committee to investigate the affairs of the Contract Finance Company of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and instructing the California delegation to urge said investigation; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask that the concurrent resolutions be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assembly concurrent resolution relative to the Central Pacific, the Western Pacific, and the California and Oregon Railway Companies.

Whereas, a resolution with a preamble has been introduced, and is now pending in the Congress of the United States, in which preamble it is specifically charged that the Central Pacific, the Western Pacific, and the California and Oregon Railway Companies have received donations and subsidies from the United States and from the State of California, and certain counties and municipalities within that State, and also from the State of Nevada and the Territory of Utah, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $156,825,000, which donations and subsidies were granted to said railway companies for the sole purpose of aiding them in the construction, equipment, and maintenance of their railways; and that the directors of said railroad companies corruptly entered into contract with themselves for the construction of said railways under the name of Charles Crocker & Co., and the name of the Contract and Finance Company, whereby a large portion of said subsidies and donations has been unlawfully diverted from the legitimate object for which they were granted by said directors, and fraudulently converted by them to their own individual use and emolument; and whereas said resolution provides for the appointment of a committee by Congress, invested with ample powers to inquire into said alleged fraudulent contracts, and also to inquire into and report to Congress upon all matters and transactions touching the construction and management of said railways, and all the affairs and transactions of said Charles Crocker & Co. and the said Contract and Finance Company in connection therewith; and whereas it is the opinion of the Legislature of the State of California, now in session, that such investigation should be made: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the assembly, (the senate concurring.) That our Representatives in Congress be requested, and our Senators instructed, to use all honorable efforts to secure, at the earliest practicable moment, the passage of said resolution by Congress, and that the governor be requested to transmit forthwith a copy of this resolution to each of our Representatives and Senators.

MORRIS M. ESTEE,
Speaker of the Assembly.
R. PACHECO,
President of the Senate.

THADDEUS C. GREEN.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2315) granting a pension to Thaddeus C. Green; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

W. T. PATE AND SILAS Q. HOWE.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2316) giving the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of W. T. Pate and Silas Q. Howe, now pending in said court; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD BRADY.

Mr. McJUNKIN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2317) for the relief of Edward Brady, of Philadelphia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM W. WICKERSHAM.

Mr. HOOPER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2318) to extend the patent granted to William Wickersham, of Boston, for improvement in sewing-machines; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

ISAAC TAYLOR.

Mr. KELLOGG introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2319) to adjudicate the losses incurred by Isaac Taylor, the owner of the bark Alvarado, of Boston, Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE COWLES.

Mr. KELLOGG also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2320) for the relief of George Cowles, of New Haven, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AMANDA M. SMYTH.

Mr. HYNES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2321) granting a pension to Amanda M. Smyth, widow of General Thomas A. Smyth; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2322) to prevent maladministration in the civil service of the United States by its officers against whom articles of impeachment have been presented; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSACTION OF PUBLIC BUSINESS AND THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2323) to enable Members and Delegates of both Houses of Congress to do the public business with their constituents and with the other Departments of the Government, and to limit the franking privilege to certain newspapers; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that that bill be read.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that during any session of Congress, and for thirty days prior and subsequent thereto, all written and printed matter, and none other, sent to Members or Delegates of either House of Congress, and all written or printed matter and such other things as have been or may be ordered by either House of Congress for distribution to the people, bearing upon the outside of the envelope or package the words "for public service," with the signature of the Member or Delegate of either House of Congress, and none others, shall go free of postage.

The second section provides that all newspapers regularly printed as journals, and not as advertising sheets simply, shall go free of postage through the mails in the counties where the same are published, provided that this shall not entitle them to free delivery in the towns and cities where such delivery is provided by law.

The third section provides that all postal matter shall have the postage prepaid thereon, provided that where any postmaster receiving postal matter is satisfied that full postage was intended to be paid thereon, but by accident or mistake the full sum has not been paid, such postal matter shall be forwarded, and any deficit thereon marked on such postal matter and collected on delivery.

The fourth section provides that whoever shall procure to be used the signature of any Member or Delegate of either House of Congress, or shall use any such signature to forward through the mails any postal matter whatever, of or concerning the private business of any Member or Delegate of either House of Congress, or concerning any matter of private interest only of such Member or Delegate of either House of Congress, or of any other person, or on any advertisement, printed or written, or business or advertising card, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, before any court of competent jurisdiction to try criminal cases in any district of the United States, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than six months and not more than two years, and by a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $500, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2324) to fill a vacancy in the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL B. MURPHY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2325) for the relief of Michael B. Murphy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SENTENCES OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2326) to provide for deductions from the terms of sentences of United States prisoners, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, with an accompanying memorial, ordered to be printed.

DUTIES ON SCULPTURE.

Mr. MAYNARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2327) to admit certain sculpture free of duty; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTHERN METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE.

Mr. LAMAR presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, relating to the claim of the Southern Methodist publishing house at Nashville against the Government of the United States.

Mr. LAMAR. I do not ask that the preamble be read, but I call for the reading of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the senate, (the house concurring,) That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to take up and investigate said claim at the earliest practicable moment; and his excellency Adelbert Ames, governor of the State of Mississippi, is requested to transmit copies of this resolution to our members of Congress, to be presented to that body.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. ADAMS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2328) to abolish the office of superintendent of Indian affairs; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN WAR CLAIMS OF OREGON AND WASHINGTON.

Mr. NESMITH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2329) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of the expenses incurred by the Territories of Washington and Oregon in the suppression of Indian hostilities therein in the years 1856 and 1857," approved March 2, 1861; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL LINES OF WATER COMMUNICATION.

Mr. CASON introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 68) to appoint a commission to examine lines of water communication that are national in their character; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF OFFICERS RE-ENTERING SERVICE.

Mr. COBURN introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONTAGIOUS AND INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask unanimous consent of the House to have a day set apart for the consideration of a bill in relation to the importation of infectious and contagious diseases. I would be perfectly willing to consider the bill to-day if the House is ready to do so; if not, I would ask that Wednesday, March 11, at two o'clock, be fixed as the time for its consideration. The yellow fever is now raging in Havana and at various places in Southern and Central America, and may at any time appear on our coast. This bill has received the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I object, for that will require it to take precedence of other matters.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE FOR NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. TYNER. In accordance with the notice I gave to the House a few days ago, I now move to suspend the rules and pass a bill to authorize weekly newspapers to be sent in the mail within the county of their publication, and exchanges between publishers to be transmitted in the mail free of postage.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I trust that bill will be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, in order that it may be examined in connection with other propositions relating to that subject referred to that committee.

The bill was read. It provides that from and after June 30, 1874, the publishers of weekly newspapers may send one copy thereof to each subscriber, in the county where said newspapers are printed and published, free of postage; and publishers of newspapers and periodicals may mutually interchange their publications not exceeding sixteen ounces in weight, and not exceeding one copy in each exchange, free of postage; but that carriers in cities where the letter-carrier system is or may be established shall not deliver such newspapers and periodicals unless postage thereon shall be paid at the rate fixed by law on other newspapers and periodicals of the same size.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask the gentleman to modify his bill so as to include monthly with the weekly newspapers.

Mr. TYNER. I prefer to return to the old law simply.

Mr. RANDALL. If this proposition to suspend the rules is not seconded, will it be in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads?

The SPEAKER. Should the motion to suspend the rules not be seconded, the bill will not be before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Several bills upon this subject have been introduced and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. It would be unjust to consider and pass this bill now without reference to the other bills.

Mr. SHANKS. My colleague designs to stifle debate by offering the bill to-day.

The SPEAKER. Monday is not a day favorable to debate. [Laughter.] Under the rules no debate can be had on the proposition to suspend the rules.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and Mr. TYNER and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 71, noes 95.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

SEEDS, CUTTINGS, ETC., BY MAIL.

Mr. FORT. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed which I send to the Clerk's desk. It has already been discussed, and I think it will meet with no opposition.

The bill, which was read, directs the Commissioner of Agriculture to forward by mail, and prepay the postage thereon, to any address within the United States which may be furnished him by any Senator, Member of the House of Representatives, or Delegate in Congress, all packages of seeds, cuttings, roots, and scions, furnished by said Department for distribution, and also all reports, books, and documents made or furnished by said Department for distribution among the people.

The question was taken upon the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 34, noes 85; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FORT and Mr. GIDDINGS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 29, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE—DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to occupy five minutes in submitting a statement preparatory to offering a resolution.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Upon the list of employés of the House there are eleven wounded soldiers. Five of them have lost either an arm or a leg, and three have suffered wounds in battle, which, as defined by the pension laws, are equivalent to the loss of a limb. There may be possibly some reduction in the number of these employés, especially if no bill should pass reviving the franking privilege so far as documents are concerned. I have drawn a resolution affecting these eleven men, and directing the Door-keeper, in case any reduction should be made, to retain these soldiers, who have lost either a leg or an arm, and the three who have suffered wounds equivalent thereto under the pension laws. I have here in brief the military history of each one of the soldiers whom I have named in the resolution. I will read only one of these histories, as a fair specimen of all.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Read all.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The names will all be read; but it would take more than my five minutes to give the history of them all.

Charles E. Diemar, late a first lieutenant in the Forty-ninth Regiment Illinois Infantry, lost his left arm at the battle of Fort Donelson. He received four other wounds in the same engagement, and carries a minie-ball in his left leg. He has a family of five to support.

Some of the cases, of course, are not so strong as this; but there is one case a good deal stronger, as I see in reading over these histories. But I have the assurance of these soldiers, and of others conversant with their cases, that the facts here stated in writing are correct. I therefore offer the resolution which I send to the desk. I may add that the persons named in the resolution are all officers who perform their duties to the satisfaction of those employing them and of the House.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Door-keeper of the House is hereby directed to retain on the roll of employés of the House the names of Charles E. Diemar, Henry Cliff, Charles S. Reisinger, J. J. G. Ball, William M. Gibson, Samuel H. Decker, J. A. Traverse, William T. Fitch, Hudson Decker, Mark J. Bunnell and Philip W. Coleman, soldiers who lost an arm or leg or suffered wounds equivalent to the loss of a limb in battle during the late war.

Mr. RANDALL. My colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] asked permission to make a statement, but he did not ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If there be objection to the resolution, I will move to suspend the rules.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask my colleague whether these soldiers are able to perform the same service that would be performed by able-bodied men?

Mr. SCOFIELD. If these soldiers are dismissed, able-bodied men, I presume, will take their places.

Mr. SPEER. But will do no more than these men now do for the same pay?

Mr. SCOFIELD. It may be possible that there will be some reduction in the present force; and if this resolution be adopted the Door-keeper will have to give the preference to these disabled soldiers and retain them.

Mr. SPEER. But the point I want to get at is, whether these soldiers render the same service that able-bodied men would perform for the same pay?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Exactly.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will state to the House the residences of these parties or the localities from which they come.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I can give the localities from which they enlisted; that is all the information upon the point of locality that I asked for. I will say, in the first place, that only one of them is from Pennsylvania. Charles E. Diemar served in the Forty-ninth Regiment of Illinois Infantry; I suppose he comes now from the State of Illinois. Henry Cliff was a captain in the Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers; he lost his leg at the battle of Gettysburgh. Mr. Reisinger is from Pennsylvania now, and enlisted there. Mr. Ball enlisted as a private in the Twenty-sixth Regiment Massachusetts Infantry; I do not know whether he now comes from the State of Massachusetts or not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He does.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Gibson was from Illinois; Samuel H. Decker was from Ohio; he lost both arms in the service, but with artificial arms he can open doors. Mr. Traverse enlisted from New York; Mr. Hudson Decker from New Jersey. Mr. Bunnell and Mr. Fitch were originally from Ohio; and Mr. Coleman was from Michigan. I do not know whether all these now hail from the States from which they enlisted, or whether they have been recommended by members of those States. I only know that, according to statements they have given me, they enlisted from the States I have named.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] what reason he has to apprehend that the Door-keeper will remove any of these persons? May we not assume that he will retain them upon the rolls, from sympathy if nothing else, if they are worthy and can render the same service as able-bodied men?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not know but that he will do so.

Mr. ARCHER. The Committee on Accounts have had before them this matter of reduction of force; and they are not disposed to act unkindly toward any soldier in the employ of this House. This resolution ought properly to go to that committee. I am sure there is no disposition on the part of the committee to do anything whatever that will interfere with any maimed soldier in the employ of the House. But, if the present force is retained in this House, a deficiency appropriation must be made to replenish our contingent fund. It has been the constant effort of the committee ever since the beginning of this session to bring the folding force within reasonable bounds without doing an unkind act to any soldier. I hope that this resolution will go to the Committee on Accounts, where it properly belongs.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how many of these employés there are altogether?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understand that on the folding-room list there are sixty-six.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Has the gentleman included in this resolution all the disabled soldiers?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have included all the disabled soldiers upon that list. There is what is called the messenger-roll, to which I am not now alluding. There are disabled soldiers perhaps on that roll. If some gentlemen know employés who are wounded soldiers and are not embraced in the resolution, it will be found, perhaps, that their names are on the messenger-roll.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I desire the House to understand exactly whether these men are or are not all the disabled soldiers.

Mr. SCOFIELD. They are, as they informed me, all the disabled soldiers upon the list I have named.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not know that I have any time to yield.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I wish merely to ask a question—whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not consent to make his resolution general in its form, so as to instruct the Door-keeper to discharge no disabled soldier so long as he can be retained consistently with the interests of the public service; in other words, Mr. Speaker, to retain disabled and wounded soldiers, and if the Door-keeper must discharge anybody he shall discharge only able-bodied men and not those who have been wounded and disabled in the war.

Mr. HOSKINS. If the gentleman will allow me a moment I will make a brief statement.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman for a minute.

Mr. HOSKINS. The Committee on Accounts, Mr. Speaker, of which I am a member, have had this question of reduction of the force in the Door-keeper's department under consideration for the last month, and they have already passed a resolution through their committee directing a reduction of at least one-third of the previous expense for the last month. That has been adjusted and arranged by the employés of this House under the Door-keeper, so that during the last month the expense has been one-third less than what it has been during the preceding months in that department, and the expense hereafter will be one-third less than it has heretofore been. I submit, then, inasmuch as this matter has been considered by the Committee on Accounts, the whole subject should be referred to that committee, this resolution as well as all others. I will say to the members of this House there is not a single member of that committee whose whole sympathies and feelings are not drawn out in favor of these soldiers. But, besides these eleven persons named in this resolution, there are other worthy soldiers, and maimed soldiers, who have equal claims upon this House with these eleven gentlemen. I suggest, therefore, the only proper course this resolution should take would be to let it go in the first instance to the Committee on Accounts, where the whole question will be examined fully and carefully. I pledge this House, for one member of that committee, these soldiers will have the fairest consideration at our hands. The only reason why the committee have not introduced a resolution touching this reduction in the Door-keeper's department is, there has been pending a bill in reference to the restoration of the franking privilege, so far as the distribution of public documents is concerned; but as that bill has been rejected it is proposed to report for the action of the House a resolution embodying the judgment of the committee on this question.

Mr. BUFFINTON. I would like, if my friend from Pennsylvania will permit me, to make a statement on the pending question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will yield, of course, to the chairman of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. BUFFINTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire members to vote intelligently on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Now, the Committee on Accounts cannot dictate the names of the employés on the Door-keeper's roll, but they have the right to determine the number of those employés. When we were appointed last December we found upon the Door-keeper's roll the same number of employés there was in the preceding December, a year before, when we were printing and sending out to our constituents, through the mails, tons upon tons of public documents. That was the case in December last. In January the same roll was allowed and passed by our committee, because we supposed Congress would make some arrangement for sending away the documents printed by its order. No such result, however, was reached, and the Committee on Accounts directed the Door-keeper to reduce his force for February to the extent of one-third of the whole expense of his employés; and the expense of his department for the last month has been reduced to that extent.

As I said before, the Committee on Accounts cannot name the men whom the Door-keeper shall place upon his roll, but they can and will fix the amount to be paid from the contingent fund of this House unless they are directed otherwise by the House itself.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, when I yielded to my friend from Massachusetts, just what he has said, that even if this resolution were referred to them they have no power over this subject; that while they can fix the number of employés, the Door-keeper himself has the right to select them, and he selects whom he pleases. Now in reference to the suggestion of my friend, that the committee will travel outside of their powers if they direct the Door-keeper to retain these wounded soldiers upon his roll, I only wish to say that the Door-keeper has already discharged three wounded soldiers whom I will name. First, Charles E. Diemar, late first lieutenant in the Forty-ninth Regiment Illinois Infantry, who lost his left arm at the battle of Fort Donelson and received four other wounds in the same engagement, carrying a minie-ball in his left leg, and who has a family of five to support. The Door-keeper has also discharged Henry Cliff, late a captain in the Seventy-sixth New York Volunteer Infantry, who lost his left leg at the battle of Gettysburgh, and has a family of four to support. He has also discharged Charles E. Reisinger, a captain in the One hundred and fiftieth Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry, who lost his left foot at the battle of Petersburgh, and has parents depending on him for their support. These three men have already been discharged, and I have no doubt the Door-keeper will thank us to pass this resolution and give him an excuse to retain these men upon his roll. He sympathizes, I have no doubt, with the wish on our part to retain one-armed and one-legged soldiers upon the rolls of his department, but unless this House will take the responsibility to pass such a resolution as that I have introduced, pressure will be brought to bear upon the Door-keeper, to which he will have to yield, as in the case of the discharge of these men, and send away crippled soldiers from service about the Capitol of the country which they fought to protect and preserve. I now demand a vote on the resolution.

Mr. HOSKINS. Let me ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the House will indulge me with further time, I will yield, of course.

Mr. HOSKINS. If this resolution is referred to the Committee on Accounts for their consideration, they will examine it to see whether there are not other soldiers with equal claims who should also be retained. The Committee on Accounts have no disposition but that of the most friendly character toward these wounded soldiers.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I know they have; but they have no power over the subject, and therefore I have introduced this resolution.

Mr. HOSKINS. If the resolution be referred to that committee we can report upon it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. These facts have been given to me by these soldiers themselves, and if I should find they have deceived me and through me deceived the House, I would be the first man to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution. Is there a second to that motion?

Mr. SENER. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I yield to the gentleman, if the House will allow me time for that purpose.

Mr. RICE. I want to offer a suggestion for settling this whole difficulty. If all further action on this matter is deferred for one week, and in the meanwhile this House should pass the bill for the free distribution in the mails of public documents, there will be no person to remove. We will want all of these men.

Mr. SCOFIELD. This does not prevent that.

The regular order was demanded by several members.

Mr. TODD. I ask my colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] to yield to me to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen are calling for the regular order; and the resolution cannot be amended, because this is a proposition to suspend the rules.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 70, noes 59.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SCOFIELD, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX.

Mr. WOODFORD. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If this resolution be voted down, will it then be in order to offer a resolution covering all cases of disabled soldiers who are or have been during the last month in the employ of the House?

The SPEAKER. There is nothing out of order on Monday, and nothing in order until it is recognized.

Mr. WOODFORD. That is fortunate. Then I was not out of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. If it is in my power to modify the resolution before the House divides, I desire to add the words, "and all other disabled soldiers."

Mr. KILLINGER. I suggest to my colleague to strike out the names of all the parties named in this resolution. This may be a sharp movement on the part of a few to get the direction of the House in their favor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] yields to me to have a resolution read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the heads of Departments are hereby advised, as the sense of this House, that in discharging clerks, officers, and employés from the public service in their several Departments, they shall discharge civilians who have not been in the Army or Navy, and retain disabled soldiers or sailors, and the wives, widows, daughters, and sisters of soldiers or sailors: Provided, They are competent to perform their respective duties: Provided also, That two members of one family shall not be employed in the same Department in Washington in any case; and it shall be in order for the Committee on Appropriations to embody this proposition in one of the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not yield for that. But I will modify my resolution, as I have said, so as to include "all other disabled soldiers."

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. NESMITH. I move to amend by inserting "that the people be governed by the same rule in electing members of Congress." [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. And also in electing the Speaker of this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. NESMITH. I accept the amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement with reference to one of the individuals named here, before the vote is taken.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object.

Mr. COX. Before the vote is taken I want to say one word.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to debate.

Mr. COX. I do not oppose this resolution, but I desire just to say——

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will take his place as teller along with the the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 90.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended and the following resolution adopted:

The Clerk read as follows;

Resolved, That the heads of Departments are hereby advised, as the sense of this House, that in discharging clerks, officers, and employés from the public service, in their several Departments, they shall discharge civilians who have not been in the Army or Navy, and retain disabled soldiers or sailors, and the wives, widows, daughters, and sisters of soldiers or sailors: Provided, That they are competent to perform their respective duties: Provided also, That two members of one family shall not be employed in the same Department in Washington in any case; and it shall be in order for the Committee on Appropriations to embody this proposition in one of the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to modify that, by inserting the words "and officers of this House" after the words "heads of Departments."

The SPEAKER. That modification will be made.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I suggest to my colleague that he strike out that part of the resolution in relation to two members of one family being employed in the same Department. I think it is a very hard provision.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] the insertion of one word in his resolution. The resolution ought to have come from the Committee on the Civil-Service Reform; but I suggest to the gentleman that he insert the word "equally" before the word "competent."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, no; no competitive examinations.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I think the proviso to which I have referred is unnecessary, except in extraordinary cases.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the House will allow me, I will merely state why I put in that proviso in relation to two members of one family serving in the same Department. It is because I look upon this as a sort of provision for soldiers' families; and where one member of a family is in office, he gets enough to sustain the whole family, and it is not right to put in two or three members of the family.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not like this way of bringing up matters without consideration by any committee. We have objectionable things brought up here every Monday. I do think that the resolution ought first to be considered by a committee.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. KELLOGG were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 99, noes 24.

So the motion was seconded.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules and passing the resolution; and (two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the resolution was agreed to.

PAY OF SCHOOL-TEACHERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to report forthwith a bill which shall compel the payment of the wages of the school-teachers of the said District, which are now, as it is alleged, many months in arrears.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I ask that a communication from the comptroller of the District on this subject be read.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I am perfectly willing, if the House is willing, to have ten minutes allowed to the gentleman from the District, or any other gentleman, if I can have ten minutes to reply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from the District merely asks to have a communication read.

Mr. FORT. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. Only by general consent.

Mr. FORT. I object.

Mr. CHIPMAN. That communication is an explanation of the condition of the school fund, and shows that that fund is already overdrawn $173,133.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The school-teachers of this District, over which we have exclusive jurisdiction in all cases, have had no pay since the 1st of September, and women who are dependent upon their wages are without shoes.

Mr. FORT. I object to debate.

The question was put on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, and no quorum voted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think that in justice to the House some statements ought to be made, pro and con, in regard to this matter.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The whole matter can be explained when the bill is reported; but I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from the District be permitted to make a statement, and that I be allowed ten minutes to reply.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let the comptroller's statement be read. It shows that the school fund of the District has been overdrawn more than $170,000.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. We want to remedy that thing.

Mr. ELDREDGE. You can do it by an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object to the leave asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts, unless other gentlemen can be heard. I desire to say something myself.

Mr. SPEER. I would like to have the resolution read again. It is simply a resolution of reference.

Mr. HALE, of New York. No, sir; no, sir.

The resolution was again read.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and Mr. HALE, of New York, and Mr. G. F. HOAR were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 53.

So the motion was seconded.

The question recurred on suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays. I trust the House will not pass such a resolution as this without understanding it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I again appeal to the House to allow short statements to be made.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I want about three minutes.

Mr. ELDREDGE. What is the objection to having the statement of the comptroller read?

Several members called for the regular order.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays, and only 14 members voted therefor.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was put; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND REPORTS.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I move that the rules be so suspended that the House may adopt the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Department of Agriculture was wisely created for the purpose of procuring and disseminating new ideas and useful knowledge among the masses of the people of our great agricultural districts; and whereas a large sum of money is appropriated annually for the maintenance of this Department in prosecuting the investigation, gathering the information, and collating facts which are embodied in its annual reports; and whereas this useful knowledge and expensive information can only be practically and readily made valuable to the people through the publication and distribution of said annual reports; and inasmuch as the House of Representatives by its recent action has refused to make any provision for the distribution of the two hundred and twenty-five thousand copies of the Agricultural Report heretofore ordered to be printed, thereby formally declining to disseminate this valuable information and practically determining to deprive the people of the benefits of the Department, and thereby also rendering this Bureau nugatory and useless: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the former joint resolution directing the Government Printer to print two hundred and twenty-five thousand copies of the Department of Agriculture Report of 1872 be recalled from the Senate, reconsidered, and repealed, and that the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to report to the House without unnecessary delay a bill to wind up, discontinue, and abolish the Department of Agriculture by the 1st day of January, A. D. 1875.

The question was taken upon the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 43, noes not counted.

So the motion was not seconded.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS IN NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I move that the rules be suspended, so that the House may pass a bill to extend the provisions of section 21 of chapter 200 of the acts passed at the second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The bill provides that the provisions and benefits provided in section 21 of chapter 200 of the acts passed at the second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress shall extend and apply to all persons of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who have enlisted or shall enlist or serve in the naval service, or any arm or branch thereof, or of the Marine Corps of the United States, and who have been or shall be hereafter honorably discharged; such provisions and benefits to apply in like manner as, by said section, they are made to apply to persons who have enlisted or shall enlist in the Army of the United States, and have been or shall be honorably discharged.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I desire to make a brief statement in regard to this bill. By the law of 1862, any unnaturalized alien serving in the Army one year is entitled to citizenship upon his honorable discharge. For some reason the naval service and the Marine Corps are not included. I would not ask for a suspension of the rules in relation to this matter, had it not been that, for nearly twelve years, unnaturalized persons enlisting in the Army have had the privilege of taking out papers of naturalization at the end of one year, while the same privilege is not given to persons in the naval service, or in the marine service of the United States. Bills of this character have been introduced into this House, but have never been heard of again. For that reason I ask a suspension of the rules for the purpose of passing this bill, giving the same privilege to unnaturalized persons who enter the naval service or the Marine Corps which is now given, and which has been given since July, 1862, to the same class of persons who have served in the Army.

Mr. ELDREDGE. As I understand, all there is in this bill is a provision to extend to those who are in the Navy the same privileges that are extended to those who have served in the Army.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. That is all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the section referred to be read.

The Clerk read the section, as follows:

That any alien, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has enlisted, or shall enlist, in the armies of the United States, either the regular or the volunteer forces, and has been, or shall be hereafter, honorably discharged, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, upon his petition, without any previous declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States; and that he shall not be required to prove more than one year's residence within the United States previous to his application to become such citizen; and the court admitting such alien shall, in addition to such proof of residence and good moral character, as is now provided by law, be satisfied by competent proof of such person's having been honorably discharged from the service of the United States, as aforesaid.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This bill is a perpetual thing for the Navy.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. It is so now for the Army.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Just the same?

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Exactly.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. A bill of this nature was considered by a committee of the Forty-first Congress, and passed by the House.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Who is entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no right to assign the floor to any one. This is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. If I have any right to yield to any one, I yield to my colleague.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] who was first on the floor. The Chair would be glad to hear both gentlemen.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move that both be heard together. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish merely to call the attention of my colleague [Mr. SCHUMAKER] to the form of the bill which he has introduced. It strikes me as objectionable in form. I think one of the greatest defects of our legislation is, that instead of a bill saying what it means and what it purports to provide, it is put in disguise in the form of saying that the same thing shall be done in a certain case that is done in some other case, thereby making great confusion.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. My friend is a lawyer, and would not want me to put anything like buncombe in the bill. I have stated just what this bill means.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has had read the original law; and I think that, as a lawyer, the gentleman will agree with me that this bill is very clearly and carefully drawn to cover the cases in point; to provide, in other words, that sailors shall have the same privilege as soldiers with reference to naturalization.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I am entirely in sympathy with the object my colleague has in introducing this bill, but he can certainly draw in fewer words a bill which shall state upon its face in precise terms the privileges it confers.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I cannot do it: I tried it several times, and finally was obliged to put it into the shape in which I have presented it. The manuscript of the bill will show that in my first attempt to draft the bill I did what the gentleman suggests, and tried to frame, without referring to the former act, a provision that should place our sailors on the same footing, with reference to naturalization, as the soldiers; but as the paper will show, I erased my first draught because I thought it unlawyer-like and not so clear as the form in which the bill now stands.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I think a bill of three lines could be framed to accomplish the object.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. If the gentleman can frame such a bill, I certainly would not object to it.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire that the House shall clearly and distinctly understand the position of this case—not that I do not regard the explanation of the gentleman introducing the bill as satisfactory to those who have never heard of the subject before—but because I wish to state that this question has already been twice considered in this House in committee, and by the House itself. During the Forty-first Congress I introduced a bill identical in terms with that now presented, which was reported upon favorably by the committee to which it was referred, and passed in the House without opposition. In the Senate, however, it was never acted on. Again, in the Forty-second Congress, I had the honor to introduce a bill precisely identical in terms with the first; which was referred, reported upon favorably by a unanimous vote of the committee, was again passed by the House without opposition, again buried in the Senate, and never resurrected during the life of that Congress. The present bill proposes to do just what this House tried to do first in the Forty-first Congress, and again in the Forty-second. It simply extends to sailors who honorably serve the Government in the Navy the same privilege with regard to naturalization that was years ago extended to soldiers of our Army.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. The bill to which the gentleman refers was brought in here and passed at a very late day in the Forty-first Congress, and again in the Forty-second. There did not appear to be any opposition to the bill in either case. Still, as those bills failed in the Senate, let us now take a fair start and see whether by action thus early in the session we may not be able to secure to the unnaturalized persons who enlist in the Navy the same privilege enjoyed by unnaturalized persons in the Army.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire to offer a substitute which is much shorter than the bill of the gentleman, and will, I think, accomplish the object equally well.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I have shown this bill to as good lawyers as there are on the other side of the House, (to be sure I omitted to consult my colleague,) and they agree that the bill is correct in form.

Mr. HALE, of New York. An act of three lines would be a great deal better.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

So the bill (H. R. No. 2330) was passed.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. HOLMAN. In behalf of the Committee on Commerce, I ask that the bill (S. No. 350) in regard to the Louisville and Portland Canal, be made a special order for two weeks from to-morrow—the 17th of March. This is a bill which ought to be considered at an early day, being designed to carry into effect the provisions of the river and harbor appropriation act of last session. The necessity of legislation on the subject is indicated by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to the present Congress.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let the gentleman except the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think this bill will occupy an hour.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire the gentleman to except the currency bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. If I can get the ear of the Chair, I have a proposition to make.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think this measure, when it comes up, will occupy an hour's time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why does not the gentleman bring it up now?

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will adopt that suggestion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to suspend the rules to make the bill a special order for two weeks from to-morrow, after the morning hour.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why not bring it up now?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not ready for consideration at this moment, as a report is yet to be made from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest, then, that the gentleman modify his motion so as to make the bill a special order for Monday morning next, after the morning hour. That would be a very good way to spend Monday; and I think no committee would object.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there be unanimous consent to that arrangement, it will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. GARFIELD. Even if there is not unanimous consent, the gentleman can no doubt carry in that form a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. I modify my motion, then, in that way.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules to adopt the motion as modified, it was seconded.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the order was accordingly made.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the House that the banking and currency bill be made a special order in the House for Wednesday, the 11th of this month, after the morning hour, to the exclusion of all other orders excepting appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to know whether that motion, if adopted, will displace the other bills that have heretofore been made special orders.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion is that the currency bill, the bill reported by himself as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, shall be made the special order in the House at half-past one o'clock on the 11th day of this month, and from day to day until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other business except appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it to be made a special order in the House? I understood the gentleman to say he asked it should be the special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MAYNARD. No; in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. That cuts off everything. It would cut off debate on this bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That would not allow amendments to be made to the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly amendments will be allowed.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will this prevent a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the forty-four million bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion, if it prevails, will have this effect: This will be a special order for that day in the House to the exclusion of all other orders, except the transportation bill, if it should go over. The transportation bill being under precisely the same rule, and being made of prior date, would, of course, shove this ahead if it were not finished by the time this is reached. If that is out of the way, then the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee would make this a special order to the exclusion of everything but appropriation bills, and it would not be in order to go into Committee of the Whole on anything except appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Would not the right to amend be placed within the control of the gentleman having charge of the bill if it be made a special order in the House?

The SPEAKER. Strictly speaking, the power to amend a bill is within the control of a majority of the House.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. But would that opportunity to amend the bill be exercised if there should be a demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. Not if the previous question was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not this put this bill ahead of the forty-four million bill?

The SPEAKER. This would take this bill out of the Committee of the Whole for consideration and put it in the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We cannot do that.

Mr. MAYNARD. My purpose, as far as it is in my power, is to have a full discussion of this bill as far as the House may desire, and to give gentlemen an opportunity to present their views in the form of such amendments as they may deem proper.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow amendments to be voted on?

Mr. MAYNARD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman from Tennessee propose to enter a motion to recommit so as to cut off amendments?

Mr. MAYNARD. Not at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to state that the forty-four million bill is in point of fact embraced in the bill reported by the gentleman from Tennessee from the Committee on Banking and Currency, and which he proposes to make a special order in the House on the 11th of March, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. I think not. How does it embrace the forty-four million bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. It provides for four hundred millions of currency.

Mr. RANDALL. But that does not embrace the forty-four million reserve.

Mr. KELLEY. Discussion has already commenced on the revenue bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Now, will the discussion of that bill be postponed if we make the special order suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee?

The SPEAKER. If the special order be made, as indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee, it would not be in order to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on and after that day, except on appropriation bills, until the currency bill was disposed of.

Mr. KELLEY. There are other gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means who are anxious to express their opinions on the subject of the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is to give precedence to this bill at that date; and the effect of his motion is to exclude all other subjects with the exception of appropriation bills.

Mr. MAYNARD. I postponed it to the 11th of March, because at that time I supposed these other matters would be out of the way.

The SPEAKER. This special order is to take effect next week. Is there a second to the demand for a suspension of the rules?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 39; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. MAYNARD and Mr. SPEER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes not counted.

So there was a second.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and Mr. MAYNARD's motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that the Senate had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 512) to extend the time for completing the Wisconsin Central Railroad in Wisconsin; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 6) in relation to the bronze statue of Jefferson presented to Congress by Uriah P. Levy, an officer in the United States Navy.

HOMESTEADS TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move the rules be so suspended that House bill No. 1760, entitled "A bill to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," be taken up for consideration, and at the end of an hour's debate the previous question be considered as ordered, and the bill put on its passage.

The SPEAKER. At what time does the gentleman propose to have it taken up?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Now. If there be any objection to that, I move it be put on its passage now. I thought gentlemen might want to debate it. I am willing it should be debated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] on a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to have my motion decided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, proposes to have taken up at this time and passed the bill reported by him to amend the homestead act.

Mr. PAGE. Has not that bill been made a special order?

The SPEAKER. Even if it had been, that would not interfere with the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This bill has been before the House for a long time. Every gentleman probably is acquainted with it. It is a re-enactment of the homestead law, with some additional provisions and the repeal of the pre-emption law. I am pretty sure that after it has been read, scarcely any gentleman, if there be one, will object to its immediate passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest that, while the motion is pending, the bill itself be read.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The SPEAKER. While that motion is pending the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] who desires to offer a resolution.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House a statement in detail of the expenditures of the contingent fund of the Department of Justice, from its organization in 1870 until the present, showing the amount paid, when, for what, and to whom.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. SPEER. I move to suspend the rules, and pass the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I will tell you why I object.

Mr. SPEER. I do not want the gentleman to tell us.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object, because that information is already before a committee of this House.

Mr. SPEER. A resolution similar to this was passed in regard to the Treasury Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury has furnished the information to the House. We wish now to get this information from the Attorney-General. The House and the country want it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have got it all already.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, there were—ayes 44, noes 54.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SPEER, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 84.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a statement to the House. He was about to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] to try the sense of the House on going into Committee of the Whole on the tax bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] will withdraw his proposition in regard to the homestead bill, and the motion of the gentleman from New York should prevail, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania afterward; and the House may vote to-morrow morning on the homestead bill—going over as unfinished business, if the House shall adjourn thereon.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I agree to that.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Then I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the special order, the tax bill, reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen desire unanimous consent to refer bills, &c. The Chair will now entertain their requests.

T. R. HAGGARD.

Mr. DURHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2331) to reimburse T. R. Haggard, late colonel ——— Kentucky Volunteers of United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TWELVE-MILE CREEK, NEW YORK.

Mr. HOSKINS, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial and petition of citizens along the shore of Lake Ontario, to establish a harbor at the mouth of Twelve-mile Creek, in the county of Niagara, State of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of so much of the act of July 28, 1866, as grants bounties to certain soldiers of the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, who volunteered in the year 1861, so as to include within its benefits the same class of soldiers who were discharged by reason of disability incurred within the line of their duty; and to report by bill or otherwise.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. HATCHER, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, relating to the improvement of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

S. D. HICKS.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2332) for the relief of S. D. Hicks, administrator of R. M. Howey; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, in relation to the memorial of the Union Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, concerning the Mississippi Valley; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the concurrent resolution be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The concurrent resolution was as follows:

Whereas a memorial from the Union Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, with accompanying appendices, setting forth the necessities of the people of the Mississippi Valley, in respect to the transportation of their products and the improvement of their natural channels of communication, has been transmitted by the governor to this body for its consideration; and whereas the complete and comprehensive view of facts therein contained conclusively proves that the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries will go far toward solving the vexed question of transportation, affording to the people of different sections of our country the opportunity for interchange of their products at less cost, and to the producers, of the West especially, a choice of markets and a better price for the fruits of their industry; and whereas the measures therein advocated are in the highest degree national in character and of peculiar importance, not alone to the people of Missouri, but to the people of every State of the valley of the Mississippi: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate, (the house of representatives concurring therein,) That our Senators from this State be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress requested, to urge in the Congress of the United States the opening of the mouth of the Mississippi River, so that a clear channel of sufficient depth for the largest vessels of commerce may at all times be maintained; the immediate completion of works in progress at the Des Moines and Rock Island Rapids, the removal of obstructions from the channel of the Mississippi River, according to the recommendations of the United States engineer in charge, so that a channel of not less than ten feet in depth may at all times be maintained before the mouth of the Missouri, and the improvement of the chief tributaries of the Mississippi, and of the upper portion of that river, so that the main channel may become accessible as a highway for commerce to the people of all the States of the Mississippi Valley, and the appropriation of such sums as may be necessary to carry forward, without delay, this great work of national importance.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Secretary of State to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to the presiding officers of the Legislatures of all other States in the Mississippi Valley, with the earnest request that they will concur with the Legislature of Missouri in urging the measures herein contemplated.

Resolved further, That the governor be instructed to empower such person as may be recommended by the central committee of the Union Merchants' Exchange, of Saint Louis, to proceed as commissioner on behalf of this State to invite the special attention of the Legislatures of Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, to the necessity of the improvement of the Mississippi River, and its tributaries, and to urge concurrent action with this Legislature in its recommendations upon this subject before the adjournment of the present session of Congress; and that the actual expenses of said commissioner without salary while employed in this mission shall, by the State treasurer, be refunded to him upon his certificate of the amount, with the approval of the governor: Provided, That the sum so paid shall not exceed $500.

Approved February 20, 1874.

INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. LOWE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2333) to further provide for the sale of certain Indian lands in Kansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. ASHE. I rise to a question of privilege. In the vote on Thursday last, on the bill in relation to public documents, my name is recorded in the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] as among those who did not vote. I voted against the amendment, and I wish the Journal to be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement will go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but it is too late to correct the Journal.

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HALE, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and hereby is, authorized to continue the employment of the accountant authorized by resolution of this House, on the 13th of December last, for not exceeding fifteen days in addition to the time named in said original resolution.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. NIBLACK. I made a mistake just now and sent up the wrong resolution. I had another resolution which I intended to offer.

The SPEAKER. The House took the gentleman at his word, and referred his resolution.

Mr. NIBLACK. I now ask leave to offer the following resolution for reference:

Resolved, As the sense of this House, that any scheme for the improvement of the finances of the country will be unsatisfactory and incomplete which shall not embrace a revision of the tariff in the interest of revenue and for the emancipation of commerce from all unnecessary restrictions; and that the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to enter upon and proceed with such a revision of the tariff.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS.

Mr. HANCOCK, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill reappropriating an unexpended balance of appropriations for the removal of certain Indians.

The bill provides that the unexpended balance of appropriations made by the acts of July 15, 1870, and March 3, 1871, for the removal of the Kickapoos and other American Indian tribes roving on the borders of Mexico and Texas to reservations within the Territories of the United States, and for their settlement and subsistence on such reservations, be reappropriated, and it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to use the said unexpended balance to defray the expenses incurred by the removal of said Kickapoo Indians, and locating and subsisting them in the Indian Territory; provided that this amount shall be in full of all expenses and obligations incurred in the removal of said Indians, and that the Secretary of the Interior, in disbursing the same, shall see that all promises and obligations incurred by the commissioners to said Indians shall be fully met and discharged from this amount.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill involves the same principle which the bill to which I objected the other day involved, and that is, that there is no unexpended balance in this case at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, yes; there is.

Mr. RANDALL. It has, under the law, gone into the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; it has not gone into the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. As I insisted then so I insist now, that this should be a bill making a direct appropriation. I know nothing of the merits of the bill; but I object to the House confirming an interpretation of law by the Departments, which was in utter violation of the letter and spirit of the law.

Mr. HANCOCK. The bill says that this money is reappropriated.

Mr. RANDALL. It speaks of an unexpended balance.

Mr. HANCOCK. It reappropriates the unexpended balance.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move to strike out all that part of the bill that relates to the unexpended balance, and also to strike out "re" before the word "appropriated."

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that those words are valuable as indicating the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. HANCOCK. If it is in order I would like to have read that portion of the communication of the Secretary of the Interior which I have marked.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BECK. Is it in order to object to the consideration of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill will be printed, with the document which the gentleman desires to have read.

CONTAGIOUS AND INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask the House to take up the bill (H. R. No. 1584) to prevent the importation of contagious and infectious diseases into the United States. The bill is the unanimous report of the Committee on Commerce, and I will state briefly why it ought to be acted on promptly.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that the bill reported by my colleague on the committee, from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK,] will be acted on.

Mr. HANCOCK. I wish the matter brought to the attention of the House and acted on now.

The SPEAKER. In reality the Chair has been entertaining business, since the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] obtained the floor, by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to his yielding any longer after this.

The SPEAKER. There will be a period after the committee rises when the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] apprehended that his proposition in regard to the bill in relation to the importation of contagious and infectious diseases would have unanimous consent. The Chair gave him an opportunity to test the sense of the House upon that subject.

Mr. BROMBERG. If the House will allow me, I will state why there should be prompt action on this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I cannot consent to the consideration of this bill at this time.

Mr. BROMBERG. Will the gentleman first listen to me?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a suggestion. I see that this bill says that the regulations adopted by this commission shall have the force of law when made.

Mr. BROMBERG. No; when approved by the President.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, when approved by the President. Then the violation of them should be a misdemeanor. Should not the gentleman put in the bill a provision that no rule shall be made in contravention of the laws of Congress? Otherwise you make this commission a legislative body. The bill also overrides State rights.

Mr. BROMBERG. I would like to make this statement to the House. This bill was considered carefully in the Committee on Commerce, and is unanimously reported from that committee. We are liable any day to have the yellow fever upon us. It is now in Rio, and the black vomito has already appeared in Havana.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. My objection is that this commission, as provided by the bill, is clothed with legislative powers.

Mr. POTTER. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] desire to have action on this bill now without any discussion?

Mr. BROMBERG. I have no desire to press this matter; but I want to call the attention of the House to the importance of this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to another day being set apart for its consideration.

Mr. BROMBERG. Then I will say Thursday next, after the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that, because the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] has given notice that he will on that day call up his motion to reconsider the vote rejecting the bill for the distribution of documents.

Mr. BROMBERG. Well; say Wednesday, after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. It would not be reached on that day. The House is already acting under a suspension of the rules upon the bill in relation to cheap transportation, which is the special order for every day at one and a half o'clock until disposed of. That order being made, a suspension of the rules could not be set aside. Then an order was made to-day in regard to the currency bill, and that order must be held subordinate to the other if the two come into collision.

Mr. COX. I object to the consideration of this bill at all. It overrides State rights altogether.

Mr. BROMBERG. Then, I move a suspension of the rules for the purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] who has submitted a motion to suspend the rules. The Chair may be able to recognize the gentleman from Alabama after the committee shall rise, or early on Monday next.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the House will agree to the early consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize a motion to suspend the rules when one of that character is pending.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask that the amendments of the Senate to the naval appropriation bill be taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. SENER. A resolution was offered on Thursday last giving a general power to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to send for persons and papers in all cases. I now offer a resolution in which that power is stricken out, and we ask merely for power as to the western district of Arkansas, which was specially referred to us by a resolution of the House on the 16th of last month.

The preamble and resolution were read, as follows:

Whereas the House did, on the 16th day of February, direct the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to inquire into the expenses, disbursements, and general management of the western district of Arkansas since its organization in 1871; and whereas said committee in pursuing its inquiries under the aforesaid resolution of the House doth require for said investigation additional powers and facilities to those already conferred upon it: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said committee have authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a clerk and stenographer for such period as it may deem proper.

No objection being made, the preamble and resolution were adopted.

TAX ON MATCHES AND BANK-CHECKS.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole upon the special order, being the bill in relation to the tax on matches, and the bill repealing all stamp taxation on bank-checks and friction-matches.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to submit the proposition that these bills, upon which the gentleman from New York and others are to speak this afternoon, and upon which several gentlemen have prepared remarks, may be made the special order for Saturday next for debate.

Mr. DURHAM. What will be the effect of that order?

The SPEAKER. It would not interfere with the status of the bills in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman asks that Saturday next be set apart for debate upon these bills.

Mr. DURHAM. Suppose the debate should not be concluded upon that day?

The SPEAKER. Then it would have to be finished upon some other day.

Mr. POTTER. Would debate upon that bill be the only debate in order?

The SPEAKER. That bill only.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that they be made a special order for that day, with the understanding that no vote be taken upon them.

The SPEAKER. The bills would be left in Committee of the Whole, where they now are.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I object to that order.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. ARCHER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2334) authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to construct a lateral or branch road from their Washington branch to connect with their Metropolitan branch; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2335) authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to construct a lateral road within the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (H. R. No. 2042) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

No objection being made, the motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL D. HICKS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (H. R. No. 1976) for the relief of Samuel D. Hicks, of Richmond, Virginia, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

No objection being made, the motion was agreed to.

TAX ON MATCHES AND BANK-CHECKS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now insist on the regular order.

The motion of Mr. E. H. ROBERTS, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HURLBUT in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 263) to repeal the stamp duty or tax on matches.

THE TREASURY AND THE TAXES.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, the particular measure referred to this Committee of the Whole is the adverse report from the Committee on Ways and Means upon the bills for the repeal of the taxes upon bank-checks, and friction-matches. The amount which will be derived from matches during the current year is estimated at $2,500,000, and from bank-checks at $1,600,000. This Committee of the Whole cannot refuse to agree to the adverse report. We cannot spare the revenues which these taxes produce. It is not wise to recast our system of taxation, and impose other taxes that these may be dispensed with.

The eminent gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who is by weight of character and length of service, as well as by official position, the leader of the House, when the Committee of the Whole first considered this subject, took occasion to make his presentation of the budget. It would ill become me to follow his course of thought. His experience here has enabled him to discover the evils which have fastened like barnacles to our system of government by the toleration of generations, as well as those excrescences which have grown up through the extravagance of a great conflict. Although I may not repeat his denunciations, I will go as far as he will be willing to lead for every measure of practical and beneficent reform. When the good doctor prescribes a method for sure and rapid cure, he may be pardoned if he magnifies the evils which he will remove. If I might venture any suggestion at all in connection with so much that was so pungently and effectively said, it would be, that the remedies which the gentleman indicates, while they may be radical and comprehensive, promise to be effective not for the current year so much as in the future. Let me be content now to look at the immediate necessity.

APPEALS FOR MORE TAXES AND FOR REDUCED TAXES.

When Congress assembled in December, two demands were pressed upon it. The Secretary of the Treasury pronounced urgent the necessity for an increase of taxation to the extent of $42,000,000 a year. From many quarters came requests for financial relief. "More taxes," was the appeal of the Treasury; "more currency and less taxes" was the burden of a large number of bills referred to the committees. The bills now reported adversely are only a few of many before the Committee on Ways and Means, which represent the antagonism to the demand of the Treasury. We must meet squarely the voice from the Treasury and the voice from the tax-payers.

REDUCTION OF REVENUES.

The revenues of the country had run down from $46,344,106.78 in October and November, 1872, to $35,106,373.02 for the corresponding months of 1873. The importations, upon which the Treasury receives so large a part of its resources, had fallen from $261,826,688 for the five months, from the 1st of July to the 1st of December, 1872, to $223,151,160 for the corresponding months of 1873, and the customs revenues had dropped for the like period from $85,844,627.56 in 1872, to $70,359,021.64 in 1873. The internal revenue, collected now from liquors, tobacco, banks, and stamps on a few articles, had amounted to $51,502,192.75 from July 1 to December 1, 1872, but in the like period of 1873 was only $39,269,464.61. Of this loss of revenue, $27,718,334.16 in the aggregate, it is hard to say what was due to the change of rates for 1872 going into effect in July and August, but the greater part is traceable to the commercial depression.

This was the condition of the Treasury as we found it when Congress assembled.

While, then, the report of the Secretary, dated December 1, 1873, indicated an apparent deficiency for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1874, of $13,530,000 for current expenditures, besides the sinking fund, we are to inquire what that means, and what is the real financial situation now.

MR. RICHARDSON'S RECOMMENDATION.

Mr. Richardson submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means a letter, in which he recommended an increase of $42,000,000 in the amount levied in certain customs duties and internal taxes. These are its terms:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 12, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, transmitting a resolution of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, "asking the Secretary of the Treasury to give his reasons in writing for an increase in taxation, and why he has selected the articles named in his communication as the proper objects for increased taxation; and that he inform the committee specifically as to the expenditures and conditions of the revenue which renders the proposed increase necessary."

In the report which, in accordance with law, I had the honor recently to submit to Congress, I used the following language:

"Should there not be a revival of business at an early day, and an increase in the receipts over those of the past two and a half months, additional means will be required to meet expenses. Should such be the case, I recommend additional taxation judiciously laid, so as to be the least burdensome upon the people and business of the country, rather than a resort to borrowing money and increasing the public debt." It is on the grounds here generally stated that I suggested increased taxation.

The receipts from customs and internal taxes have not materially increased, and it is apparent that no considerable augmentation of those receipts is soon to be expected, under the laws now existing. The public debt was increased by demands which could not be avoided, during the month of November, to the extent of over $9,000,000; and it is apparent that it will be still further increased during the current month by many millions.

While the coin receipts are but little more than sufficient to pay the interest on the public debt and other coin expenditures, it will not be prudent to sell gold to increase the supply of currency.

The current expenses of the Government have already consumed about $18,000,000 of what has been called the "reserve," and there remains only about $26,000,000, which can be used before the extreme limit of issue of United States notes authorized by law will be reached. The public credit can only be maintained by keeping the receipts of the Treasury fully up to the expenditures for ordinary expenses, for interest on the public debt, and for the purchase of bonds for the sinking fund, to the extent provided by law. It is manifestly the true policy, in view of the necessity of maintaining that credit, so to levy taxes as to make it certain that the required amount will be raised with the possibility of some surplus revenue, rather than to incur any risk of a deficiency which would make it necessary to borrow money and thereby increase the debt.

In selecting tea and coffee for taxation I am influenced by the consideration that taxes on those articles are easily collected, and are not oppressive to the consumers.

In selecting spirits, tobacco, gas, railway and steamboat receipts, express, insurance, and telegraph companies, as subjects of taxation, I am governed principally by the reasons expressed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in his letter already forwarded to the committee, in the following words: "In selecting sources for possible taxation I have taken those that would give the revenue probably needed without any material increase of the present force, or any amendment to the present system, considering that it is wise to get the public revenue with as little interference as possible with the general business of the country, and that the tax-gatherer should greet the public eye as rarely as practicable."

I have presented the bills for increased taxation to the committee thus early that the subject may at once be called to the attention of Congress for such action at an early day as may be deemed expedient.

It should be taken into account that the effect of any law which may be enacted to increase taxation will not fully appear for several months after its passage, and that in the apparent disposition among the people to reduce expenditures, the rates which may be fixed will not produce the same amount of revenue as would accrue under different circumstances.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

The following extract from a letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue gives the estimate of receipts under each section, as follows:

Section 1, from spirits	$7,000,000
Section 1, from tobacco	4,000,000
Section 2, from gas	2,500,000
Section 3, from railroads, on receipts from passengers	3,500,000
Section 3, from railroads, on receipts from freight	2,500,000
Section 3, from steamboats, on receipts from passengers	300 000
Section 3, from steamboats, on receipts from freight	300,000
Section 4, from express companies	500,000
Section 5, from insurance companies	1,300,000
Section 6, from telegraph companies	250,000
Total	22,150,000

Statement of amount of duty on tea and coffee for the six fiscal years (ending June 30) 1867 to 1872, inclusive.

Year.	Coffee.	Tea.
1867	$8,637,115 85	$8,533,803 69
1868	10,637,859 48	9,414,664 29
1869	11,540,761 97	9,785,438 88
1870	12,678,616 44	10,203,047 19
1871	10,969,148 87	8,322,994 67
1872	7,192,126 06	5,133,674 03
Total	61,655,628 67	51,393,622 75

This shows the total amount of duty on coffee and tea for the six years named to have been $113,049,251.42; being a yearly average of $18,841,541.90¼.

From January 1, 1871, to July 1, 1872, the duty on tea was 15 cents per pound, and on coffee 3 cents per pound. Prior to that time the duty was on tea 25 cents per pound; on coffee 5 cents per pound.

EDWARD YOUNG, Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Bureau of Statistics.

These recommendations were made when the effects of the financial crisis were yet near and severely felt. They were prompted by a careful prudence. They have been considered by the Committee on Ways and Means with the attention to which their high source entitles them; and the Committee of the Whole House will not fail to weigh them seriously. They will prevent the repeal of any taxes unless provision is made for largely increased revenues from other sources.

We are now, however, three months further from the panic than we were when Congress assembled. The marvelous elasticity of our people is again asserting itself. The revenues are recovering. The House of Representatives has set to work in vigorous retrenchment. The balance promises to be on the right side for this fiscal year. Danger for the next has been much diminished, even in the eyes of those most inclined to prophesy evil.

THE SECRETARY'S ESTIMATES.

Using the official figures of the Secretary, in his report, combining the estimates for three quarters with the actual returns for the first quarter, we find this statement for the current fiscal year, leaving the reserve of $44,000,000 wholly out of account:

Receipts.

Source.	First quarter, actual.	Three quarters, estimated.	Total for year.
From customs	$49,195,403 68	$111,000,000 00	$160,195,403 68

*The deficiency for the first quarter appears in the report of the Secretary in a diminution of the cash in the Treasury.

THE ACTUAL REVENUES.

But the reviving business of the country has already changed the whole character of these figures. We are justified in adding at least $10,000,000, and probably $11,000,000, to the estimates of internal revenue; and at least $5,000,000, if not $8,000,000, to the customs. This is not all guess-work, nor calculation on probabilities. The whole quarter of the panic has been reported, and two months in the third quarter give the data for judgment. The Treasury revised its estimates in January, and the returning prosperity gives the figures of the first week in March a character different from those of the first week in December. First, here is the statement for the quarter immediately succeeding the panic.

THE QUARTER OF THE PANIC.

The following are the receipts and expenditures by warrants for the quarter ending December 31, 1873:

Net receipts:
From customs		$31,229,769 37
From internal revenue		22,276,191 25
From sales of public lands and miscellaneous sources		4,472,598 69
		57,978,559 31
Net expenditures:
For civil and miscellaneous		19,951,111 03
For War Department		11,349,378 63
For Navy Department		8,343,211 43
For Indians and pensions		9,205,145 10
For interest on public debt		13,881,403 49
For premium on public debt		93,126 77
		62,823,376 45

Observe that the deficiency for this gloomy quarter is, $4,844,817.14.

But an instructive comparison may be made by placing side by side the customs and internal revenue for the last fiscal year preceding and for the current year:

These tables show in themselves the justification of the estimates embodied in them.

These figures bring us to the calculations of the Treasury made in January of the actual situation for the fiscal year:

REVISED TABLE OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

July 1, 1873—Cash in the Treasury, as per Finance Report			$131,192,028 50
From which deduct sums on deposit, by provisions of law, represented in this amount, as follows:
Special deposit of legal-tenders held for redemption of certificates of deposit	$31,730,000 00
Coin deposits for which coin certificates were outstanding	39,460,000 00
			$60,002,028 50
Total available cash belonging to the Government			$60,002,028 50
Consisting of coin	$48,047,402 68
Consisting of currency	11,954,625 82
Receipts from July 1, 1873, to February 1, 1874, (five days estimated)	$165,677,972 99
Estimated for remaining five months of fiscal year	116,100,000 00
Total income			281,777,972 99
Total available resources			341,780,001 49
Expended on account of sinking fund	$12,936,450 00
Expenditures on account of appropriations from July 1, 1873, to February 1, 1874, (five days estimated)	177,174,585 59
Liabilities on account of unexpended balances of appropriations, February 1, (five days estimated)	$138,381,557 37
Deduct amount which will not probably be required	72,369,034 39
Estimated expenditure from regular appropriations	66,012,522 98
Interest on the public debt	$41,286,661 48
Accrued interest due and unpaid	6,987,477 02
	48,274,138 50
Deduct amount of accrued interest which will not be called for during the fiscal year	6,000,000 00
Estimated expenditure on interest account	42,274,138 50
Estimated expenditure on account of sundry indefinite and permanent appropriations	6,825,000 00
Sinking-fund account:
Amount required to be provided	$29,191,369 28
Bonds already purchased	12,936,450 00
Leaving amount to be provided	16,254,919 28
Total expenditure			321,477,616 35
Cash on hand July 1, 1874			20,302,385 14
Total			341,780,001 49

By this statement it will be seen that, exclusive of the sinking-fund account, during the first seven months of the fiscal year the expenditures were $11,496,612.60 in excess of the income; and that during the last five months of the same it is estimated that the income will be $988,338.52 in excess of the expenditures; thus showing the expenses of the entire year to be $10,508,274.08 more than the income of the Government, and a reduction in cash in the Treasury of $26,763,193.36.

To restore to the Treasury the amount of cash on hand July 1, 1873, will require that provision be made for the above deficiency in the revenues of $15,508,274.08, and the amount required for the sinking-fund purchase, charged as an item of expenditure on the preceding page, $16,254,919.28.

The further sum of $12,936,450 will be required to reimburse the Treasury for the amount actually expended in the purchase of bonds for the sinking fund.

The total amount, therefore, which will be required to provide for the deficiency in the revenues and the sinking fund is $39,699,643.36.

CHAS. F. CONANT,
Chief of Division.

WARRANT DIVISION, January 26, 1874.

THE NEW BALANCE.

It is encouraging to observe that the better aspect of business and the improvement in the revenues justifies the Department now in placing the receipts for the year at $281,777,972.99, while the estimates in December footed only $271,304,310.58. This increase of $10,473,662.41 in the receipts is a very moderate allowance, as the returns submitted conclusively demonstrate. It is not a sanguine calculation which will place the receipts for the current year to July 1 at $288,000,000.

This will require that the customs and internal revenue together reach $268,000,000. The former will overrun $165,000,000, and the latter will in all reasonable probability exceed $103,000,000.

Observe that these estimates only require that the customs and internal revenue, for the five months beginning the 1st of February, shall be $116,000,000, against $121,407,800.78 last year. It is abundant caution that prompts to the taking of the lower figures.

THE EXPENDITURES.

On the other hand, now, with the knowledge of the expenditures for the Navy in connection with the Virginius affair, and all the demands for the year, the expenditures which, in December, were stated at $289,641,524.99, are reckoned at $291,686,247.07, or an increase of $2,044,722.08. This includes all probable deficiencies.

It will surprise gentlemen who have not examined the subject to know that, setting aside the extraordinary appropriation for the Navy caused by the Spanish troubles, the expenditures thus far for the current year have been less than for the corresponding period last year. That appropriation was $4,000,000. Including that outlay, the comparison will be found in the following table, in which the receipts are also stated for the like period:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Warrant Division, January 10, 1874.

Let me add now the expenditures for January, and we have this result:

EXPENDITURES FOR SEVEN MONTHS.

Excluding the $4,000,000 naval appropriation, the expenditures for this year thus far appear $2,440,634.70 less than the corresponding period of the year preceding. The full proportion of interest, but not the sinking fund, is included in these figures. Every creditor has made haste to ask for his money, and the stir of trouble with Spain involved considerable expenditures beyond the extra appropriation. We have a right to expect greater savings in the remaining months. No teacher of economy is so direct as a bare treasury. Out of the authorized appropriations, large sums will not be needed, because the work cannot be completed, and much of it will not be begun during the year. The expenditures for the current year, besides the sinking fund, cannot well exceed $285,000,000, and surely cannot overrun the receipts.

In past years, as the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts so well exemplified, a large balance has remained of unexpended appropriations, amounting in the aggregate, as he showed, to $72,369,034.39. This year will show a balance of the same kind. Comparing the actual payments up to this time with those of previous years, and looking forward with regard to the strict administration of the Treasury, it will be safe to count the ordinary expenditures and interest at $285,000,000, or, with the sinking fund, $315,000,000.

The alarm which the honorable chairman of Ways and Means has sounded will have its effect. It will surely keep the results down to the estimates of the Treasury, made up before that alarm was given. The ordinary expenditures, including everything but interest and payments of the public debt, are placed in those estimates this year, at $182,296,670.42.

In other recent years they have been:

1870	164,421,507 15
1871	157,583,827 58
1872	153,201,856 19
1873	180,488,636 90
1874, actual and estimated	182,296,670 42
1875, estimated by Treasury	187,603,390 10

It is within this scope only that Congress has jurisdiction, and here is the margin for retrenchment. The expenditures from all the permanent appropriations of which the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means made so much, are all included here except the interest and sinking fund alone. We want to get back to the minimum of 1872. We have hardly exceeded—we hope to underrun—the sum of 1873. The action on appropriation bills thus far justifies confidence that for 1875 the ordinary expenditures will not exceed $165,000,000.

The deficiency, therefore, has occurred not through increase of expenditure, but solely through the very great and unexpected falling off in the revenues.

COMPARISONS.

Obviously, then, the impression is not correct which is derived from the statement that the Government is liable to $393,846,650.74 of payments in this current year, and that an adverse balance may exist of $52,066,649.25. These sums are large enough to be sensational, and the chairman explains that they do not fairly represent the condition of the Treasury. Nor does the comparison of the expenses of last year, without reduction of the debt, with appropriations for the current year, including the sinking fund, make a fair presentation. The citation of the chairman of Ways and Means is:

While we have been reducing our receipts on the one side, we have been increasing our expenditures at the other. Listen now to the expenditures of the Government since the present Administration came into power. The first year the expenses of this Government were $322,865,277.80; in 1870 they were $309,653,560.75; in 1871 they were $292,177,188.25; in 1872 they were $277,517,962.67; in 1873 they were $290,345,245.33. The appropriations for the present year sum up $319,652,644.31. In 1870 we reduced our expenditures to $309,000,000 and we paid 101,601,916.88 of the public debt; in 1871 we brought them down from $309,653,560.75 to $292,177,188.25, and we paid $94,327,764.84 of the public debt; in 1872 we brought them down still further, to $277,517,962.67, and we paid $99,960,253.54 of the public debt in addition. In 1873 the expenditures ran up to $290,345,245.33, and we paid but $43,667,630.05 of the public debt. This year our appropriations have gone up from $290,000,000, our expenses for the last year, to $319,000,000 without paying one dollar of the public debt.

Upon the challenge of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the chairman of Appropriations, some modification of the statement was made. The exact facts are that, in every year except the present, no part of the sinking fund or other payments on the public debt, in the figures cited, is included; while the sinking fund is included for 1874. The evidence is in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which on the seventeenth page of tables states the expenditures for the several years cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] just as he states them if the various items be combined, without payments on account of the debt; and on the fourth page of the report the separation is even more clear, showing that the sum of $290,345,245.33 does not include the payments on the debt, which are stated on the fifth page at $43,392,959.34; making the total for the year $333,738,204.67.

On the sixth and seventh pages of the same report you may see that the estimate for the expenditures of this year, putting the several quarters together, is $289,348,578.21, without the sinking fund; including the sinking fund, as the gentleman from Massachusetts states it, $319,652,644.31.

The fair comparison then is to omit all payments on account of the debt in all years or in none; or, if the interest be included and the sinking fund omitted, the figures are as follows:

1870	309,653,560 75
1871	292,177,188 25
1872	277,517,962 67
1874	289,348,578 21

All of these figures are taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

These receipts and expenditures for the current year show a credit balance of $3,000,000 or more. It is small, smaller than it ought to be, but it is on the right side.

The Treasury authorities reckon that during the remaining five months of the year the income will be $988,338.52 in excess of expenditures. The deficiency of the past seven months, the improving revenues show, may be wiped out, with discreet moderation in the current expenditures. More than that. The balance can be changed to the other side, and made very considerable. It is no extravagant anticipation to count confidently upon that result.

CASH IN THE TREASURY AND SINKING FUND.

Two other items appear in the Treasury statement of the deficiency: first, the reduction of cash in the Treasury; and, secondly, the outlay for the sinking fund.

Net excess of redemptions charged in receipts and expenditures	.....	.....	.....	32,986,828 91

It was stated in the annual report that the net redemption of the public debt was $32,986,828.91. Only a part of this item, however, is such a redemption as satisfies the provisions of the sinking fund, as will appear from the following statement of the items which compose it.

We find, then, that the actual payments on account of the sinking fund are represented by the purchase of bonds, $12,936,450, leaving $16,254,919.28 to be yet made to comply with the law. To the actual payments may properly be added the net redemption of the loan of 1858, $5,470,000, and thus only $10,825,878.28 stand now to be adjusted. That is to say, in this way the sinking fund has been fully met for the portion of this fiscal year already passed. All of this the Department includes in the revised estimates now submitted, and it is obvious the sinking fund may be satisfied from the resources of the year. The increasing revenues will provide the means. In view of that increase, without further use of the reserves than the portion now afloat, this provision may be made from the resources actually available.

This reduction of the cash in the Treasury, upon the statement, will leave it $20,302,385.11. But all this while, and in all these figures from the Department, in all these calculations, not a cipher has been set down for the reserve. Nor did the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] include it at all. So much as has been used to meet the temporary exigencies occasioned by the panic, we cannot omit altogether. It has not been credited to receipts; it does not appear in resources. Yet it has been relied upon by the Department. That portion of the reserve, less apparent increase of debt, may at least be counted in the apparent balance, and that will become about $40,000,000 for the 1st of July next, upon the low estimates of the Department.

But setting the reserve out of account, and allowing for the increase in revenues, the available balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July next ought to be over $35,000,000, against $60,002,028 at the beginning of the year, and $34,761,000 the 1st of last September.

The cash in the Treasury, including reserves paid out, ($26,000,000,) is to-day $48,746,176.15.

By the published statement of the 1st of March it would appear that $26,000,000 of the reserve has been drawn upon. Of this sum $3,727,754.03 was in the Treasury subject to daily use; $5,470,000 represents the actual payments on account of the loan of 1858; and only the balance has passed out in the current transactions. No necessity rests upon the Treasury to use any more of this peculiar fund; and on the contrary, early steps may be taken for its withdrawal.

REDEMPTION OF THE LOAN OF 1858.

It is noteworthy that before the commercial pressure has ceased the Treasury has been actually paying in gold the loan of 1858 to all holders who did not prefer a 5 per cent. bond at par to the coin. While the premium on gold has been high and the demand for money severe, creditors have for the greater part chosen the securities of the United States. The actual results of the option given to the holders of the bonds has been: amount paid, $5,470,000; amount exchanged and converted into the funded loan, $14,600,000. Let this simple, eloquent fact stand for itself, to demonstrate that the Treasury does not "go to protest."

THE DEFICIENCY AND THE RESERVE.

The severe reduction in the revenues perhaps naturally alarmed the Secretary of the Treasury, however transient might be the causes which produced it. It was his duty to consider how, if the apparent deficiency were prolonged and aggravated, means could be secured for maintaining the credit of the Government. He had not hesitated, when the revenues fell so low, to draw upon a fund which his predecessors had used in part in emergency. He had practically treated as immediate resources the reserve of $44,000,000. Mr. McCulloch, as Secretary, was not restrained by the act limiting contraction from again issuing the legal-tenders. Secretary Boutwell, when in his opinion necessary, had drawn upon the reserves. Congress had for six years acquiesced in this construction of the law. The debates upon its passage foreshadowed such action. All the officers of the Government had recognized the legality of this action. The Supreme Court clearly sustained it in the case of The Banks vs. The Supervisors, 7 Wallace, 26, when Chief Justice Chase said:

> The act of February 25, 1862, provided for the issue of these notes to the amount of $150,000,000. The act of July 11, 1862, added another $150,000,000 to the circulation; reserving, however, fifty millions for the redemption of temporary loan, to be issued and used only when necessary for that purpose. Under the act of March 3, 1863, another issue of one hundred and fifty millions was authorized, making the whole amount authorized four hundred and fifty millions, and contemplating a permanent circulation, until resumption of payment in coin, of $400,000,000.

As an original proposition, my vote would not be for the increase in the currency. It has been made. The notes are afloat. If not legally issued, those particular notes are not valid, and the only logical course is to call them in—not merely so much in amount, but the identical notes alleged to be illegal, as my witty colleague [Mr. COX] proposes in a bill introduced by him. That is impracticable. We cannot refuse to recognize so much of the reserve as has been issued. Time will be required to call back the excess of currency. Accepting the facts as they are, we must endure the evils involved, and we are entitled to all the benefits which can be derived. Let us take no step backward into the domain of war taxes; no plunge into the wild sea of inflation. Let us find out where we stand, and turn our steps steadily, if not rapidly, toward the golden goal of specie payments.

EXPLANATION AND CAUTION.

The drain upon the reserve has been large. For myself, I greatly regret the necessity which called for it. The panic not only cut down the revenues; it sent every creditor to the Treasury for his money, often months in advance of the time he would in ordinary cases have asked for it. Thus an apparent increase in expenditures has gone on side by side with a reduction of receipts. The adverse balance has been augmented by both causes. The effect of both causes has nearly, if not quite, ceased. But as alarm could be carried to excess in the darkest days, it is now easily possible to exaggerate the favorable symptoms. For this argument, let us go no further than the actual returns for eight months and comparative estimates for the residue of the year abundantly sustain us.

JANUARY AND FEBRUARY.

The January statement of the public debt illustrates and enforces my position. Even in the last week of the month only the most sanguine expected that the scales would be shown to be in equilibrium. In fact, the debt was reduced $1,845,211.76, although last year it was in the same month increased $406,243.18; so that this year that month showed a better result than last year by $2,251,454.94. Comparing three years, we have this result:

Receipts and expenditures for the month of January, 1872, 1873, and 1874.

The comparison for February is satisfactory, but not so striking. Last February the debt was decreased $5,277,880.77. This year the reduction is $2,590,047.45. The following table shows the comparison for three years:

WARRANT DIVISION, March 2, 1874.

Observe that the reduction of the debt for February exceeds the requirements of the sinking fund. The excess is not large, but it exists, and it is most significant. It may fairly be increased by the item of "old interest" above. And the receipts of to-day indicate even a better result for the current month.

FISCAL YEAR 1874-'75.

For the next fiscal year, 1874-'75, the Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the receipts will be $305,700,000. They can safely be put at $315,000,000, if not more, under present laws. The expenditures, including the demands for the sinking fund, are placed at $319,191,000; but the disposition of Congress has been proved to keep them below $300,000,000.

Three of the regular appropriation bills have passed this House, and in each case sturdy effort for retrenchment was cordially sustained. The Secretary's report had the same basis as the original estimates submitted to Congress. In the naval bill, which the able gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] so successfully carried through the House, the sum appropriated is $2,853,917.21 less than the original estimates, and about $853,917 less than the revised estimates. So in the Army appropriation bill, of which my eminent and faithful colleague [Mr. WHEELER] had charge, the sum voted is $4,791,800 less than the original estimates, and $4,466,800 less than the revised estimates; and I appeal to my colleague to know if the House did not with alacrity follow his brave and efficient lead. The other example is the fortification bill, reported by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] in which a reduction of $2,647,000 is made below the original, and $453,000 below the revised estimates; and the total appropriated, $954,000, is about one-half the expenditure of last year, and of several of the years preceding the war. For example, the appropriations were:

In 1856	1,842,600
In 1871	1,211,500
In 1872	1,322,000
In 1873	1,847,000
For 1874	954,000

Not only has the House generously supported the Appropriation Committee in every regular bill, but in the case of fortifications it clipped $40,000 from the bill as reported.

These three bills show a saving, as compared with the original estimates:

Naval bill	$2,853,917 21
Army bill	4,791,800 00
Fortification bill	2,647,000 00
Saving	10,292,717 21

In the bill already reported to the House the reductions recommended by the committee are, in the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, $3,953,730.60, as compared with the estimates, and $4,776,307.56 as compared with last year.

The Departments ask this year for only $2,312,839.78 for deficiencies, against $6,116,677.39 last year. So that the reductions already indicated, as compared with the basis of the Secretary's estimates for next year, are already $17,049,285.49.

What the House has done is specific, tangible work; and we need more of it in the bills yet to be reported. Doubtless the House and the Committee on Appropriations will complete a reduction of $25,000,000, or even more, from the original estimates. That will justify the confidence that the credit balance for the next fiscal year will exceed $20,000,000.

THE ACTUAL SITUATION.

In a word, the revenues are now ample to meet every accruing obligation. If they were not, I would not look to the future for a remedy, but would now cry "tax." By no act of mine should the public credit be imperiled. But the receipts are now in excess of every current expenditure, including the monthly part of the sinking fund. We are now incurring no deficiency; we are reducing it. The purchases which remain to be made for the sinking fund will not further reduce the cash in the Treasury even temporarily. The next fiscal year will more than counterbalance every falling off caused by the panic.

The gentleman from Massachusetts spoke contingently of danger that the Treasury might go to protest. Were such danger imminent he would not appear here opposing taxes, heroic and extraordinary, if need be, to meet the exigency. He would be exerting all the resources of his practical statesmanship to protect the national credit. He does not advocate increased taxation, because he knows that the case is substantially as now stated. The only real pressure upon us is the withdrawal of the reserves emitted. That emission is the full measure of the deficiency.

The situation, then, forbids any present increase in the burdens imposed upon the people. It seems to me absolutely clear that the duty of Congress is not to enact more taxes.

MUST NOT REDUCE TAXES.

But it is clear that we cannot afford now to reduce the revenues. If the panic of 1873 had been foreseen in the spring of the preceding year, perhaps Congress would not have gone so far in the abolition of taxes; but the disaster has occurred, and the country is recovering from it. The revenues are already reaching the usual figures. No one pretends that any increase of taxation ought to be permanently made. It has been shown, I think, that every obligation of the Treasury can be fully met without any increase. Keep the helm steady, and the good ship of state will sail on over every breaker to sure prosperity.

NEW TAXES TO BE AVOIDED.

Congress has wisely refused to legislate in a fright. Commercial disaster did not result from legislation, and no act of Congress could rebuild the castles and restore the fleets of the victims. The first quality of a legislator and of a ruler is faith in the country for which he acts. The Treasury was impoverished temporarily, but the national resources were not exhausted. The national credit must not be put in peril; but neither must burdens be unnecessarily placed upon the production of the country.

Taxes are a necessity but not a blessing. A generous people will in great emergencies cast their whole property on the altar of patriotism; and the record of mankind shows no nobler example than that of these States in our national struggle for the Union. Such sacrifices measure the value of the object sought, and do not suggest necks ready for any yoke. The fallacy that heavy taxes are a sign of public prosperity is dangerous. Burdens for which no adequate reason exists are near akin to tyranny. Laws which extort moneys from industry and trade, except upon grounds of public benefit, are oppressive, and tend toward confiscation.

Internal taxes fall inevitably upon the labor of the country, either by checking production, by reducing its rewards, or by increasing the cost to the consumer, or both. Whatever sum may be added to the tax schedules will inevitably at first increase prices, and thus affect the consumer injuriously. A large addition to the amount drawn by the Treasury from the pockets of the people will also operate as a contraction of the currency. It will again return to circulation, to be sure; but the additional demand contributes to stringency.

THE TIME INOPPORTUNE.

With industry paralyzed, with production disturbed, with business struck as by lightning by the swift disaster of a general shock to credit, the time was not propitious, when Congress assembled, to levy new taxes. With commerce checked, with importations reduced to a minimum, with trade reviving, but hardly confident of the future, while counting up the losses of the recent past, only the most dire necessity could excuse the attempt to extort further levies from the emaciated and exhausted subject. It was the duty of the Secretary to look first of all, perhaps exclusively, to the Treasury and its exigencies. Congress must care also for the citizen and his trials. Not in the exhaustion of a panic, not upon the wrecks of a commercial storm, will the wise statesman impose new taxes, when the fiscal year promises a favorable balance in the exchequer.

MR. RICHARDSON'S RECOMMENDATIONS PRUDENT, IF TAXATION WERE NECESSARY.

The recommendations of the Secretary, if the emergency were to become so aggravated that new resources were imperatively demanded, might well be deserving of consideration. Without urgent necessity, another and not I should impose duties upon the articles which give to the home of the humblest, cheer and comfort. Whatever was the effect of the repeal of the duty on tea and coffee, no one can doubt that the reimposition would fall upon the consumer for all the stock now in the country as well as for that to be imported.

The large revenues already derived from spirits and tobacco fall upon products growing to be of vast value to us for export. The taxes are heavy, but are honestly assessed, and the production is growing year by year. In every barrel of spirits sent from the West to the East, from our shores to Europe, go eighteen bushels of wheat. The tax on spirits is a tax on grain, and was, last year, $52,009,371.75. Tobacco is the local wealth of several of our States, and it pays $34,386,303.09 to the Treasury. Earnest efforts are on foot for the total abolition of these taxes, and able arguments have been made before the Committee on Ways and Means in favor of bills for this purpose.

Whether a larger assessment could be as closely collected on these articles, may be questioned. Any advance in the tax would foster speculation and disturb legitimate production. The present rates have been in force less than two years, not two years until August next. Let us try and be content with the magnificent and growing revenues derived from them, for the present. Both interests are entitled to a brief period of stability. As a question of revenue purely we ought to try not to meddle with production at short intervals. Every change disarranges the system of collection, and affords room for leaks.

ANNOYING LITIGATION.

Frequent changes in the revenue laws are the occasion of annoying and costly litigation. Suits which are grievous and mischievous in every way spring out of new rates and new methods. The country will accustom itself to any system decently conceived if opportunity be given it. The present system is cheaply administered, and its results are on the whole satisfactory. Time will remove the friction, and citizens liable to tax will learn the narrow path prescribed for them. See what was the record of litigation last year as shown by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

Recent reports made to Congress expose the risks and burdens of importers and the heavy penalties collected, as well as the nice questions of construction by which the revenues are impaired. Such penalties and such refundings weaken the laws tenfold more than the year's collection of regular dues.

Let us do nothing to increase such litigation, which does more than anything else to render the Government obnoxious. Give the citizen occasion and means to learn the law and its application. He will prefer, as the safer and cheaper course, to pay the tax and avoid the penalty. You can force him to conclude that you let loose officials upon him for their own profit, and not for the benefit of the Treasury. Litigation diminishes as rules and practice under the revenue laws become clear and understood. Let us try that taxpayers may be able to learn the demands upon them, for the great majority will, without stress of marshals and attorneys, honor every requisition of the Government.

ELASTICITY OF THE REVENUE.

Concede that the current fiscal year can be closed without an adverse balance, and the problem of the threatened deficiency in revenue is solved, provided the expenditures are kept down. For our population increases at the rate of 3 per cent. a year; and the national wealth grows at the rate of 2 per cent. annually. The productiveness of taxes will increase more rapidly than in the ratio of population. Since the close of the war the demands of the Treasury have been reduced as follows:

In internal revenue:
By act of July 13, 1866		$65,000,000
By act of March 2, 1867		40,000,000
By act of February 3, 1868		23,000,000
By acts of March 31, 1868, and July 20, 1868		45,000,000
By act of July 14, 1870		55,000,000
By act of June 6, 1872		20,651,000
Total of internal revenue		248,651,000
In customs:
By act of July 14, 1870	$29,526,410
By acts of May 1, 1872, and June 6, 1872	31,172,761
Total of customs		60,699,171
Total reduction		309,350,171

Yet the revenue of 1873 was $322,177,673.78, while that of 1865 was $322,031,158.19; almost exactly identical. For 1866, the ordinary revenue was $519,949,564.38; the largest in the history of the Government, and the largest, let us hope, for generations to come.

WATCH THE OUTGO.

But taxation weighs only on one side of the scales. However heavy that may be, it will be all too light if the expenditures are in excess. Experience proves that a favorable balance can be found only by strict watch of the outgo. Drain production and commerce as much as you may, your Treasury will be empty if the expenditures run out like a flood.

Say put pith into his axiom, "The best of all the plans of finance is to spend little." Interpret the phrase to enjoin a wise economy, and not mere niggardliness, and it is worth volumes of disquisition. With the lavish notions of Americans, with the generosity which is characteristic of our people, with the continual pressure of private and local interests for liberal appropriations, Congress is never likely to err in the year's appropriations on the stingy side. Because the policy is not flaunting, because it tramples on clamorous clients, because it seems to benefit only the Treasury, retrenchment requires high courage and sturdy manhood. In the arena of legislation free and lavish and dashing expenditure wins applause, albeit it is prodigal of things not its own. Economy gets no plumes or favors, but always, like another character—

> His yron cote, all overgrowne with rust,
> Was underneath envelopéd with gold;
> And in his lap a masse of coyne he told.

The honorable chairman of Ways and Means deserves every credit for showing how and where retrenchment may be enforced. Let us hope he does not feel that he may stand aloof from the battle on the top of a hill, as Moses stood when Joshua fought the Amalekites, after the murmuring of the people. Perhaps in his long fight for retrenchment, his hands grow weary, and he looks to have some Aaron and Hur stay them up, so that they may be steady until the going down of the sun. But not so far have we gone, and not such is the work of a leader of to-day. This is the hour when his voice must not only ring out the cry "Go forward," but he must lift up his rod and stretch out his hand over the sea and divide it, and only so shall the children of Israel go on dry ground through the midst of the sea.

FIELDS OF REFORM.

Let me not depreciate the valuable service which the honorable chairman of Ways and Means has rendered by his thorough and comprehensive survey of the "fields of reform." I dare predict that the House will rejoice to follow him, and to strike hands for sharp and decisive work. Nay, more. So potent is his influence here, that even before his warning voice was raised the work which he suggests was in good part begun and some of it well-nigh consummated. He points out seven "fields of reform."

1. He recommends that annual should be substituted for permanent appropriations whenever practicable. This is so far well that the newspapers have been telling us for weeks that the Committee on Appropriations was engaged about the matter. The House will not be laggard in correcting an evil which is not new, and which it was believed existing laws had in good part remedied.

2. The chairman of Ways and Means urged the abolition of certain custom-houses, and reduction in the cost of collecting the customs. He is the chairman of a sub-committee charged to effect this very reform. It may be true that the table he submits requires explanation in several points, and that it will be found that several offices, reported as deficient, will be proved to be self-sustaining. But no one can doubt that he will be efficient in a work the necessity for which he has so clearly shown.

3. While the honorable gentleman was speaking and calling for restrictions on the refunding of customs, a bill was awaiting action in the House to accomplish that result, and it was on Monday two weeks ago passed under a suspension of the rules.

4. To reduce the cost of paying pensions, the rules have been suspended to permit action when the appropriation for that purpose shall come before the House.

5. The growth of the Treasury Department attracted the notice of the distinguished gentleman. Several committees of this House have been for weeks employed in inquiries looking to retrenchment, and the difficulty of the problem has not prevented some progress already in several Bureaus.

6. The expenditures for public buildings are also subjects of criticism. The Treasury, it is understood, orders no new work; and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have reported no new projects, and I have the authority of more than one member that it will probably recommend few or no new buildings at this session.

7. The post-office appears also as a "field of reform," in which, while I have no specific information, it is fair to presume that the proper committees are not idle, but are trying to do their duty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BECK. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. It is moved that the gentleman's time be extended. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Certainly not everything has been done in any of these fields. But it is just as certain that honest, vigorous effort has been directed to every one of them. The chairman of the Ways and Means pointed out the extent of the work. Truly the harvest is great. He will agree with me that the House has already entered upon it; and in this fact is the evidence of the fairness of a paragraph which I find in the RECORD, but did not hear in the delivery of his able and comprehensive speech. It was withheld a few days for revision, and I may be allowed to express my admiration that, like good wine, time rendered more mellow and less harsh a production which is so long to endure. The paragraph which the action of the House so well justifies is this:

> And I might as well now say that I am not here to-day to arraign the republican party, but only to urge it to take hold of the work of reforming and improving old systems and methods which have been inherited, not created, by it.
> The republican party had its origin in the reform and overthrow of old abuses. It will forget its mission only when it ceases to search them out and abolish them. No other party before it had either the courage or the power to work out reforms within its own organization. It is the glory of the republican party that it probes its own sores and corrects its own errors. It has never waited to be driven from without to a discharge of its duty, but, impelled by the very purpose of its being, it has shrunk from no self-discipline nor hesitated in the application of the most radical reform. It is in this spirit that I speak to-day, arraigning nobody, but seeking, if possible, for better methods of administration than those which the country has outgrown, or experience has proven unwise.

No truer words were uttered by the honorable gentleman on that occasion. The only hope for the reforms indicated by him, the only hope for retrenchment, the only hope for a brave and economical administration, is in the republican party in this House and in the country.

THE BRITISH EXAMPLE.

The European powers are staggering under hopeless indebtedness, in spite of exhaustive taxation. Germany has had the moderation to husband the great indemnity collected of France. If it does not sooner or later expend the money and transfer its balance to the other column of the ledger, it will afford a brilliant exception in the experience of great nations. For the record of Britain is an illustration of the drift of all. The beginning of that financial structure which will endure while the British name defies oblivion was begun during the revolution, and the debt was £664,263 in 1689. It has had a growth irregular, but, measured by long periods, pretty constant ever since. The Napoleonic wars carried the debt to its maximum in 1815, when it touched the gigantic sum of £816,311,940. Within two years it was reduced nearly £40,000,000; and in 1817 became £776,742,403, and was not so low again until 1828, when it fell to £772,322,540. The reduction was further continued with vibrations until 1842, when the amount rose again to £774,319,913, tending then downward to £764,608,284, in 1847. But it leaped upward again to £772,401,851, in 1848, when it was higher than it had been twenty years previously, and reached a new maximum in 1859 of £786,801,154, going clear back almost to the aggregate at the close of the wars against Napoleon. Since that maximum a reduction has been accomplished to £784,972,103 on the 31st of March, 1873. Gladstone's boasted reduction leaves the debt only £31,339,837 below the fearful maximum of 1815.

This debt has rolled up to this magnitude in spite of munificent revenues. Under William the Conqueror, from 1066 to 1086, British revenues averaged £400,000 a year, and fell to £80,000 under Henry III, (1216–1272,) and even to £65,000 under Henry VI, (1422–1460.) Under the proud Tudors they rose again to £400,000, under the seventh Henry, and even to £800,000 under Henry VIII, while the great Elizabeth maintained her sway on an average revenue of £500,000 a year. A century trebled the receipts, for under the Commonwealth they became £1,800,000. Yet the debt really begun only when under William III the revenues rose to £4,000,000. The Georges carried the revenues from £7,000,000, in 1714, to £70,000,000 in 1820, and under them the debt reached its maximum. Under Victoria the revenue averaged £55,000,000 a year from 1837 to 1859; but reached £72,893,313 in 1857, falling and remaining below that sum until 1869, when it was £72,591,992, becoming £75,434,252 in 1870; and for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1872, £74,708,314, and for 1873, £76,608,770.

The British example teaches that the increase of revenue seldom contributes to reduce the debt, even in time of general peace; and that such increase, with apparent fluctuations, fastens itself like a leech upon the body-politic, and often is followed by addition to the debt. Falling off of revenue may create a deficiency. Limitation of expenditures must produce the surplus.

REDUCTION OF OUR DEBT.

We have been boasting of our own reduction of indebtedness; and it is true that the progress is honorable. We do not weary of repeating that our debt has been reduced since 1865 by $570,483,180 up to the beginning of this fiscal year. So, to be sure, British financiers boasted of the grand payments after the close of the continental wars against Napoleon, and of the renewed prospects of diminution about 1828 and the period immediately succeeding. They were nearly staggered by the new maximum after the Crimean wastes; and if the subsequent reduction be permanent all previous experience will be contradicted, and the result prove better than their hopes.

The British debt has crystallized beyond the magnitude of all the Koh-i-noors in the world, not because of low revenues, but in spite of the bravest taxation which statesmen have been able to devise. A few years of reduction have not prevented marvelous permanent growth in the debt. We too may drift back toward our greatest war aggregate. Here is the lesson which now and here presses home upon us: Great revenues breed lavish expenditures. Payment of a national debt, diminution of public burdens, are virtues left for American legislators to enforce as a permanent policy. The means will never be found in increased taxation. The secret is simple, but it is sure. Keep down expenditures. That is the real problem of the hour. That is the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which this House will do well to heed.

GLADSTONE'S PROPOSITION TO REDUCE TAXATION.

While the recommendation is made to us to increase taxation, Mr. Gladstone dissolves the British Parliament, and goes to the country with a pledge to employ a surplus of £5,000,000 for the abolition of the income tax, and the reduction of duties on articles of common use. Mr. Disraeli denies that any virtue exists in the proposal, because any ministry must use its surplus in the same way. Britain is unanimous for a reduction of taxes, and the tories carry the elections. The contrast is too broad. We must not make our budget bigger while Britain is making her budget smaller. The country may rejoice that the necessity does not exist of retracing our policy of reducing taxes. The sudden strain upon the Treasury warns us that it is possible to go too fast in that direction. But we are not called to face squarely about and add to the tax list.

ALTERNATIVES.

It is to our honor that the national debt has so much diminished since the war, and a steady policy is inaugurated for its final liquidation. We must keep on the payment. Better increased taxation than increased debt. But out of the jaws of a crushing panic we come without necessity for either. Our present revenues protect the national credit. They will improve, and retrenchment can be enforced. Steady, tried laws will bring more money to the Treasury than new statutes which promise more largely. Just now enough is enough. A full Treasury tempts to extravagance. Revenues without excess prompt to wise economy. Applications for $500,000,000 beyond the regular appropriations lie in wait about the Capitol. Most of them lose hope because of the condition of the Treasury.

Do not impose taxes simply that the Treasury may overflow. Your reviving revenues remove all pretext for renewing or extending your forced loan of paper money. You can continue to reduce, and need not increase, your funded debt. Better borrow than inflate; better tax than borrow; better than either, find your revenues equal to the demands upon them.

Congress may not be brave enough to call in the reserves promptly. It ought to have courage to say now, "The extreme limit of the flood of irredeemable paper has been reached; stop, and turn back." Do not be frightened by the dread of more taxes. The Secretary has need to sell gold. The currency receipts are less than the currency demands, while the gold receipts are much more. Indeed, only two years have shown the internal revenue above the ordinary expenditures, to wit, 1867 and 1870. You will have to sell gold until you make your currency equal to gold. That is the remedy for current evils.

Down with the bugbear of more taxes. Use your sinking fund for maintaining the national credit by paying the debt which is due. Let Congress begin thus to redeem the nation's plighted faith, and your revenues will be ample for every purpose. Your internal revenue will become gold, and the current money will pay your customs. Stop ballooning, and believe in your resources. Give to industry the pledge of stable laws, and to trade the guarantee of improving currency.

Do not aggravate the burdens of taxation. Do not now take away revenues which can be ill spared. Can we not all agree to these two propositions?

Mr. WOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] will yield for that purpose, I will move that the committee rise. Then he will be entitled to the floor when we again go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOOD. I assent to that.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCCRARY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 263) to repeal the stamp duty or tax on matches, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope that my colleague will withdraw that motion for a moment. I wish to submit a motion to suspend the rules, so as to provide that on Saturday next, after the morning hour, the bill just under consideration in Committee of the Whole shall be a special order.

Mr. RANDALL. I waive my motion until that question is decided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] asks that on Saturday next the discussion of the bill which the House has just had under consideration in Committee of the Whole shall be the special order.

Mr. KELLEY. After the morning hour.

Mr. MCCRARY. If this order be made, what effect will it have if the transportatiom bill, now a special order, should not be concluded by that time?

The SPEAKER. This order, if made, would prevent the consideration of that special order on Saturday, because this bill will be in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLEY. But it will only interfere with the gentleman's bill for that one day.

The SPEAKER. Only for that day. Is there objection to the proposition?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I object.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to suspend the rules to make the order.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; there were—yeas 52, noes 9; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. G. F. HOAR and Mr. KELLEY were appointed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is it the understanding that if this order be made, there shall be nothing but debate upon the bill on Saturday?

The SPEAKER. Nothing but debate; no action on the subject.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The motion was then agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof; and the order was accordingly made.

TOPOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I wish to ask the House to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 360) making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and plans for improving the same. If the House will indulge me for a moment in an explanation, I do not think any objection will be offered to this proposition. Some two months ago this bill passed the Senate unanimously, appropriating $5,000 for the purpose of employing Mr. Frederick Law Olmsted to make a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and to submit plans for their improvement. The House referred that bill to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who have agreed on an amendment fixing $3,000 instead of $5,000 as the amount of the appropriation. With this amendment the committee recommend that the bill be passed by the House.

The object of this appropriation will be readily understood. We have here the most magnificent building of the kind that there is in the world; but its surroundings are a disgrace to the building and a disgrace to the country. It is highly desirable that no more money shall be expended by Congress upon the grounds adjacent to the Capitol until some definite plan of improvement shall be adopted, so that the money which may be appropriated for this purpose shall yield a satisfactory return.

The bill provides for having a topographical survey, and to employ Frederick Law Olmsted to lay out a comprehensive plan of improvements of the public grounds in the city of Washington. I move a suspension of the rules for the purpose of passing the bill, together with the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SPEER. Are there not unemployed Army officers enough to do this work without further expense to the Government?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. There are not.

Mr. MAYNARD. I doubt about taking that bill up and passing it now at the heel of the day's session. It is a thin House. It may be all right, but I should feel uneasy in passing it at this time.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. The time is rapidly approaching when, if we are to do anything at all in this regard, we ought to make provision for it. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill and amendments passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not press this measure at this time.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill, which was read, provides that the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is thereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, under the direction of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and House of Representatives, in procuring a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds, and the employment of Frederick Law Olmsted, of New York, in furnishing plans for laying out, improving, and inclosing the same.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been reported back from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with an amendment to strike out the word "five" and insert the word "three," so as to make it "$3,000" instead of "$5,000."

Mr. BECK. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia whether we have not enough idle engineer officers of the United States Army to do this work without any additional charge whatever?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. The topographical survey will be done by Army officers, but we have no engineer like Mr. Olmsted, of New York, to lay out a comprehensive plan of improvements of the public grounds.

Mr. RANDALL. He is a lawyer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I see no necessity for laying out any comprehensive plans of improvements, and I hope the House will not pass this bill, and so give foundation for other appropriations.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill and the amendment passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there a second?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 31; no quorum voting.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not withdraw it; I insist on a vote.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no quorum present.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not propose to withdraw my motion, and if there be a quorum present I demand tellers.

HOMESTEADS TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

The SPEAKER. Before going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the House agreed to permit the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, to report back a bill (H. R. No. 1760) to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain, and have it pending at the adjournment so it would come up to-morrow morning as unfinished business. That bill will be considered as having been reported back by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and as pending at the adjournment.

SURVEY OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Before the House proceeds to any other business I will ask unanimous consent to allow a vote to be taken on this subject to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to that.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it come up in regular order.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then I demand tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence. The Chair, however, will receive, by unanimous consent, bills for reference.

There was no objection.

MRS. HANEY WINSTEAD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2337) granting a pension to Mrs. Haney Winstead, widow of Riley Winstead, late of Hawkins County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BALANCES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BECK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, for reference to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House what portion of the balances of appropriations remaining in the Treasury July 1, 1873, made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, limited by law to the payment of indebtedness incurred during the year for which they were made, has been drawn during the current fiscal year by any of the Departments of the Government, or any of the Bureaus thereof, stating specifically from what items of said balances of appropriation the amounts have been drawn, and the purpose to which the money so drawn has been applied, so far as the records in his Department exhibit said purpose.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Is not that resolution open to the same objection, so far as action on it is concerned, that applies to my motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. BECK. I only ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I never made a captious objection in the House, and I do not propose to begin now.

Mr. BECK. Then I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL AFFAIRS IN UTAH.

Mr. MERRIAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, instructed to communicate to this House any information in his possession relating to judicial affairs in the Territory of Utah; and also to furnish to this House a copy of a communication from Judge James B. McKean, bearing date November 12, 1873, relating to this subject, and addressed to the Attorney-General of the United States.

UNPAID DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2336) to collect the unpaid direct taxes, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS IN TEXAS.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to inquire of the Chair what is the condition of the bill reported to-day by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK.]

Mr. RANDALL. It was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reported it at a time when unanimous consent was required for its consideration.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. It is very important that early action should be taken on that bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Can it not be called up by a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. Not when it has been withdrawn. And even if it could be called up on a motion to reconsider, it would be liable to the point of order that it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is already pending.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred, as stated:

By Mr. ADAMS: The petition of John Friend, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT: The petition of citizens of Parryville, Carbon County, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which made a reduction of 10 per cent. in certain duties, and remonstrating against a restoration of the duty on tea and coffee, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ——: Papers relating to the claim of William O. Redden, late colonel Third Delaware Volunteers, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 3, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FENTON. I present the petition of a large number of prominent citizens and business firms in the city of New York, on the subject of our present disordered and demoralized currency condition. This petition is signed by over 250 of the leading houses, banking firms, insurance companies, and leading merchants of the city of New York. They present the case so clearly and so well that I take the liberty to read it to the Senate. They represent that "they are greatly alarmed at the assumption of the Secretary of the Treasury of the right to issue new United States notes, commonly known as greenbacks, without the sanction of law;" and they go on to say that "the issue of irredeemable paper money, and making it a legal tender, is simply levying a forced loan upon the people of the United States. Such an extreme measure can only be excused by a vital necessity arising from a great war, and is even then in direct violation of all ordinary constitutional powers." So far as the petitioners are aware, "no civilized government has ever resorted to an issue of irredeemable paper money in time of peace; and it is a most remarkable thing that the great, rich, and prosperous nation of the United States should resort to such a ruinous expedient without the slightest necessity of an excuse."

The petitioners consequently "respectfully but most earnestly urge your honorable body to put an immediate stop to the further issue of greenbacks by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to make arrangements, by the negotiation of bonds or otherwise, to call in and cancel at once every dollar of the so-called reserve that has been issued."

This clear and concise statement is made by earnest and intelligent men, representing, I suppose, full $500,000,000 of capital. I heartily indorse all they say. The memorial was forwarded to me by the well-known firm of E. S. Jaffray & Co., and in presenting it I ask the most respectful consideration of the Senate. I now move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Ira W. Donthart, of Brown County, Kansas, late of Company D, Thirteenth Regiment Iowa Infantry Veteran Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition and papers of John Magee, praying relief from losses sustained by him by reason of the occupancy of his property, situated near Tenallytown, District of Columbia, by the United States Army engaged in the suppression of the rebellion, from August 26, 1862, to November 17, 1865; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCHURZ presented the petition of Leopold Karpeles, late of Company E, Fifty-seventh Massachusetts Volunteers, praying the balance of his bounty money due him, amounting to $190; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOGY presented a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received a petition, printed, with several pages of what purport to be printed signatures to it, which the Chair understands, under the rules, cannot be introduced in the Senate; and therefore he does not present it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of George A. Dawson, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland, praying the enactment of a law reimbursing him for certain moneys captured from his deputy by rebel forces; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the enactment of a law by Congress declaring railway companies common carriers, and fixing the maximum rate for the transportation of freight and passengers, and prohibiting unjust discriminations between "way" and "through" freight; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation-Routes to the Sea-board.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the enactment of a law by Congress for the relief of certain homestead settlers in that State, by the confirmation of their land titles as against the adverse claims of certain railroad corporations; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in response to a resolution of the Senate, a statement of the number of illicit distilleries which have been suppressed within the last six months, together with their location and daily capacity for production; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting additional testimony in relation to the New Mexico private land claim No. 72, known as Ojo del Apache, pursuant to the eighth section of the act approved July 22, 1854; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the claim of James B. Campbell, of Charleston, South Carolina, executor of the estate of John S. Regan, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 912) to provide for the inspection of the disbursements of appropriations made by officers of the Army, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1003) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, on the registers, rolls, and records of the Army, to John Laube de Laubenfels, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 911) to relinquish title of the United States in certain real estate near Columbia, Tennessee, to Rose Hill Cemetery, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William N. Denny, of Vincennes, Indiana, praying to be paid the difference between the pay of captain and major, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 560) for the relief of William N. Denny.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles H. Moseley, of Little Rock, Arkansas, praying for pay of second lieutenant from September 9, 1864, to April 12, 1865, less the pay of an enlisted man already received, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 561) for the relief of Charles H. Moseley.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense, to report it back without amendment. I give notice, by instruction of the committee, that at the first practicable moment I shall call it up for consideration.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 499) to authorize the issue of a supply of arms to the authorities of the State of Nebraska, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1039) for the relief of John B. Weber, late colonel of the Eighteenth Regiment Corps d'Afrique, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1064) to authorize the Secretary of War to lease not exceeding five acres of the tract of land known as the Old Lazaretto tract, for the purpose of erecting thereon a magazine or store-house for the storage of gunpowder, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BOREMAN, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 253) to authorize the county commissioners of Thurston County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Budd's Inlet, Puget Sound, to intersect the North Pacific Railroad at or near Tenino, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 32) obviating the necessity of issuing patents for certain private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2224) appropriating $1,400 to pay the operators in the departmental telegraph connected with the two Houses of Congress, to report it back with an amendment, and to ask that it be considered now.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That said lines of telegraph shall be for the use only of Senators, members of Congress, judges of the United States courts, and officers of Congress and of the Executive Departments, and solely on public business.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the bill go back to the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that the words "departmental telegraph" in the title should be "Government telegraph."

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would not send it back to the House for such an amendment; but it must go back anyhow.

Mr. SARGENT. If it is going back, that is proper.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill appropriating $1,400 to pay the operators in the Government telegraph connected with the two Houses of Congress."

HANSON HARMON.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 527) for the relief of Hanson Harmon.

There being no objection, the bill was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Hanson Harmon, of Wilmington, Delaware, of $334.37, in full for all claims for rent of office for the clerk of the United States circuit and district courts for the district of Delaware, from January 1, 1868, to March 25, 1870, the same to be accepted and received by him in full for all claims against the United States for the use or rent of said building.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. AMY A. HOUGH.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 449. It is a bill reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 449) granting a pension to Mrs. Amy A. Hough was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amy A. Hough, mother of Daniel E. Hough, deceased, late captain of Company A, Eleventh Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ERRORS IN PRIZE-LISTS.

Mr. CRAGIN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 229, authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize-lists.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WRIGHT. I feel it my duty to object to the consideration of that bill at present. I know it is very ungracious to object to the consideration of bills, but I want to get Senate bill No. 161 out of the way this morning if possible, and therefore I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A single objection does not dispose of it. The Chair inquired if there was objection, to avoid putting questions unnecessarily. The Chair will put the question to the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CRAGIN. I think it will take but a moment to dispose of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 229) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize-lists.

The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Navy, in all cases where corrections in the distribution of prize-money have or may become necessary, and in all cases where the names of parties entitled to share in prizes have been or may by error be omitted from the prize-lists, to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to correct and pay the same; the former upon the principle that the provisions of the act in force at the date of final adjudication govern distribution, and the latter to receive their proportion of the prizes claimed, the same as all others of like rank and pay who may have been paid, using for such purposes any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was in lines 13 and 14, to strike out the words, "using for such purposes any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," and to insert, "said payments to be made out of the naval-pension fund."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, as an additional section, the following:

SEC. 2. That the second and third paragraphs of the tenth section of the Navy prize law, approved June 30, 1864, which relate to the shares of commanders of divisions and fleet captains, shall apply to officers serving in those positions from April, 1861, (the commencement of the late war,) and the shares shall be paid in the manner as provided for division commanders in said second paragraph; and all acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I was inquiring of the chairman of the committee privately, in order to get some information about this bill, which I do not want to object to, because I have no knowledge to warrant me in doing so. I should like to hear some statement in regard to it generally, but especially as to this point: upon what evidence is the Secretary of the Navy to make these corrections and supply these omissions? I presume there is some way of doing it. I should like to know by what law and by what process it is to be done.

Mr. CRAGIN. The object of this bill is simply to correct some errors in prize-lists; for instance, if a prize-list omits a name that should be on it, and if the distribution is made, there is no reason that the committee can see why the individual whose name is omitted by mistake should not be paid. This bill was prepared by the Fourth Auditor, and I have a letter before me from the Fourth Auditor, recommending it as quite necessary. There is another class of cases where an officer has been paid for a wrong rank; for instance, paid as a master when he should have been put on the prize-list at the next highest grade; and one effect of this bill will be to pay him that difference.

The second section of the bill relates to about five or six officers who at the beginning of the war were detailed as fleet captains or division commanders. There was then no such officer designated by law. They were captains, perhaps commanding a single vessel; and they were taken from their own vessels and made fleet commanders, and consequently they did not get any prize-money at all. They would have received some portion if they had remained in command of their individual vessels in 1864.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me, I believe they were put to more responsible duty and harder service, and by performing that more responsible duty and harder service they failed to receive any compensation whatever.

Mr. CRAGIN. That is so. In 1864 Congress passed an act giving prize money to fleet captains and division commanders; but a few of them acted in that capacity prior to the passage of that law. There are only six of them, I think, all told, and this second section is designed to cover that class of cases. I have a letter from the Fourth Auditor saying that the passage of this bill will not involve more than $50,000 in money, and that is to be taken from the Navy-pension fund and not from the Treasury. I think there can be no possible objection to the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Do these gentlemen who are placed on the prize-list as commanders of fleets or divisions receive prize-money according to that rank?

Mr. CRAGIN. According to the act of 1864.

Mr. LOGAN. According to that rank, is what I want to ask?

Mr. ANTHONY. Under the existing law.

Mr. LOGAN. If that is the meaning of the bill, it is wrong evidently. The existing law applies to men having the rank of fleet commanders, and nobody else. This bill applies to men who were transferred without the rank. If that is not the case I do not understand the explanation.

Mr. CRAGIN. There was no such rank in 1862 and in 1863. In 1864 the act authorized prize-money to be paid to fleet captains, and designated the amount; and this bill proposes to pay these five or six men the same amount.

Mr. LOGAN. As if they had had that rank?

Mr. CRAGIN. The same amount as authorized by the act of 1864.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think I can explain it to my friend from Illinois. I understand that when the war commenced there was no such office as fleet captain or division commander. The exigencies of the service required the creation of that office. They consequently were not enumerated in the prize act, and received no prize until 1864, when the act was passed giving fleet commanders and commanders of divisions a share in prizes; but that act was only prospective: it did not relate back to the beginning of the war. The object of this section is to place fleet captains and division commanders who took prizes from 1861 to 1864, when the act was passed, in the same position as to prizes that fleet captains were after 1864. The money comes from the naval-pension fund. One-half of the receipts from prizes goes into the naval-pension fund, and it is very properly taken from there, inasmuch as one-half the amount which we now appropriate went into that fund, which would not have gone there if the law had related back as it ought to have done to 1861, instead of commencing in 1864.

Mr. LOGAN. That explanation proves exactly what I said—that you passed a law creating a certain rank; and then you apply that law to all persons who have a similar command without the rank.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The rank was created in 1861.

Mr. LOGAN. The rank was created in 1861. In 1864 Congress gave prize-money to that class, and, as I understand this, it is persons who were detailed in the mean time. It is to apply to a captain of a single vessel who is detailed and ordered to the command of a division. Is not that it? And yet he is not the commander of the division in fact. I understand it exactly.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand it so.

Mr. LOGAN. I do.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that when the prize law was enacted, before the late war, it accorded prize-money to all the officers known to the naval organization at that time. In 1861 the increase of the Navy required new ranks, larger commands; and so a few of our officers were rated above the provisions of the prize law as it stood at that time. We had all through the war, therefore, a few officers in command of our Navy who were not provided for in the prize law, and then when the prize law was revised they were provided for. They had been filling the commands and had been taking prizes, but were not allowed any share of the prize-money, because they filled commands not provided for in the prize law at the time.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand it exactly as I did before. It is desired to give them prize-money according to a rank they did not have. If you take a captain from a vessel and assign him to the command of a division, he is still a captain.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But there is just the point. He is a captain; but inasmuch as he is detached from his ship, the law does not reach him, and, as a matter of fact, (for I took the pains to go to the Secretary of the Navy and inquire,) these captains, who were made captains of fleets by being so appointed, lost the prize-money which they would have been entitled to under the law which had existed since 1800 by being appointed to this position.

Mr. LOGAN. It deprived them of prize-money as captains.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of any prize-money.

Mr. LOGAN. But does it deprive them of prize-money as captains or deprive them of prize-money as division commanders? That is the point.

Mr. SARGENT. They never received any prize-money whatever.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, what do you propose to give them—prize-money as captains or as division commanders? That is the point.

Mr. SARGENT. The Naval Committee propose to give them exactly the same pay that the same officers serving in the same manner received after 1864, there being no distinction between the service in 1863 and the service in 1864.

Mr. LOGAN. But there is here a distinction that we do not seem to understand very well; and I will illustrate it. Suppose I illustrate it by a position in the Army. You have a colonel commanding a regiment of the Army; he is entitled to a colonel's pay. Suppose this prize law applied to a colonel in the Army, but he was assigned to duty as a brigade commander, which is the command of a brigadier-general. That illustration shows exactly what this bill is trying to do. Instead of paying him as colonel, you would pay him by this bill as brigadier-general. That is not the rule, and ought not to be the rule. It is an honor to a man to have a higher command than his rank gives him, but no one ever expects pay for it, and it is not just that he should have it. This bill gives a man who is captain in fact, and who holds that rank and none other, as I understand it, if he happens to be assigned—not increased in rank, but merely transferred to duty in a rank that belongs to another by being allowed to command a division—the same share of this money that an actual division commander would have.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Illinois that I do not know that there is any difference in the amount or proportion of prize-money that a fleet captain gets under this law and that a captain gets; but whether there is or not, that is a subject which was determined by Congress in 1864, when they fixed the prize-money.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator from California, who I see wishes the floor, to state to the Senate whether, if a captain be assigned to the command of a division without his having that rank, he under this bill gets the prize-money of a division commander or of a captain?

Mr. SARGENT. I intended to reply to the argument of the Senator on that point; but I do not wish to do it unless I can have the floor for that purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator can have the floor. I merely asked him to state that, so that I might be correct about it.

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably a captain receives under this legislation a larger amount of prize-money than he would if he remained on board his own vessel performing the lesser duties of captain, although, in fact, these officers, being put to a higher and more arduous duty, have not received anything at all. But the argument of the Senator from Illinois is unsound in his comparison with the colonel who fills a brigadier's station, and for this reason: It is the general policy of the law applying to all colonels who are put in the position of brigadiers for temporary service that they shall receive the pay simply of colonels, and nobody proposes to change that; but suppose it had been changed at a certain time, so that a portion of those who served as brigadiers, being colonels, should receive a brigadier's pay and others should only receive a colonel's pay; would not that create an inequality which ought to be remedied by law? Either it would be wrong by statute to give those who served as brigadiers a higher pay than colonels, or all should be treated alike, all should receive the higher pay. Congress in 1864 legislated that these captains, serving in this higher capacity and performing these more arduous duties, should receive a certain proportion which it attached to the office they held, and which was then recognized by statute; and I say that it is only fair and just, if it applied from 1864 to men performing this service in 1864, that it should apply to those performing it in 1863; and there is the difference between the position of the Senator and the real facts of the case.

I hold in my hand a letter written on this subject, which expresses so concisely and so clearly the merits of this proposition of the Naval Committee that I will ask the indulgence of the Senate while I call attention to it. The writer says:

> Will you allow me to call your attention to the situation of the law concerning the shares of commanders of divisions and fleet captains in prize-money, during the late war?
> The law on the subject existing at the opening of the war, was the act of April 23, 1800, (2 Statutes, 52,) which provides that the prize-money belonging to officers and men, in certain proportions, should be distributed among designated officers and men.
> These enumerated individuals were obviously intended to include every man in the ship or fleet concerned in taking a prize.
> The officers are named, from the commanding officers of fleets or squadrons down to drummers and fifers; and to guard against any exclusion, the words "and extra petty officers" are added.
> At the opening of the war, the magnitude of the operations of the commanders of the large squadrons assembled, required the services of new classes of officers known as commanders of divisions and fleet captains; certain officers were withdrawn from their ships, and served in these capacities during the large naval operations of the first years of the war.
> Considerable amounts of prize-money belonging to officers and men were distributed under the law; but commanders of divisions and fleet captains, unknown to the service in 1800, were not named in the law, and received no share in the distribution. Left on their own ships in the old routine of service, they would have shared with the rest; but called to the larger duty, extending over all ships concerned in a capture, they became the only men in a fleet who were excluded from share in the prize-money gained.
> On the 7th of July, 1862, an act was passed for the better government of the Navy, but attention had evidently not been called to this irregularity at that early period, and no provision was made to cover it.
> But on June 30, 1864, an act was passed entitled "An act to regulate prize proceedings and the distribution of prize-money, and for further purposes." (13 Statutes, 306.)
> The subject being dealt with specifically, the irregularity was removed by the tenth section, which makes new provisions for distribution, and includes in the second and third paragraphs the officers not previously enumerated. The first three paragraphs are as follows:
> "First. To the commanding officer of a fleet or squadron, one-twentieth part of all prize-money awarded to any vessel or vessels under his immediate command.
> "Second. To the commanding officer of a division of a fleet or squadron, on duty under the orders of the commander-in-chief of such fleet or squadron, a sum equal to one-fiftieth part of any prize-money awarded to a vessel of such division for a capture made while under his command, the said fiftieth part to be deducted from the moiety due to the United States, if there be such moiety, otherwise from the amount awarded to the captors: Provided, That such fiftieth part shall not be in addition to any share which may be due to the commander of the division, and which he may elect to receive as commander of a single ship making or assisting in the capture.
> "Third. To the fleet captain, one-hundredth part of all prize-money awarded to any vessel or vessels of the fleet or squadron in which he is serving, except in a case where the capture is made by the vessel on board of which he is serving at the time of such capture; and in such case he shall share, in proportion to his pay, with the officers and men on board such vessel, as is hereinafter provided."
> Thus, after the passage of this act these officers were entitled to the share deemed proper by Congress, in view of their positions, and the nature of their services. But this makes the injustice done to the few officers who had served in these positions, up to that time, more manifest. As the law now stands, they alone of all the Navy of the United States are deprived of all participation in the results of their services.
> To redress this, the following provision was proposed to be inserted in the Navy appropriation bill of last year:
> "That the second and third paragraphs of the tenth section of the Navy prize law, approved June 30, 1864, which relate to the shares for commanders of divisions and fleet captains, shall apply to officers serving in those positions from April, 1861, the commencement of the late war, and the shares shall be paid in the manner as provided for division commanders in the second paragraph."
> This was not then passed. My object is to ask you to look over this legislation, and if the claim is right to favor the passage of such a provision at this session. It will be observed that the shares awarded are to come, as provided in the act of 1864, out of the half paid into the Treasury of the United States and credited to the Navy-pension fund. (See act of July 17, 1862, section 11, 12 Statutes, page 607.)
> This fund is already too large for its purposes, so much so that the Government pays only half the usual rate of interest on it.
> It would seem eminently just that the small amount of it necessary to repair a manifest injustice to a few faithful officers should be used for that purpose. I believe the number does not exceed six in both classes.

This is not a depletion of the Treasury of the United States; and I know of no better use that this large fund can be put to, or the small portion of it which is called for, than to pay the men who served gallantly in these exposed and responsible positions from 1861 to 1864 the same rate that they or others were paid rendering the same service from 1864 down to the close of the war. And that is all there is of it. It does not change the rank of any one; and so far as the policy or principle of the payment itself is concerned, that was settled by the legislation of 1864. The Naval Committee considering this bill thought that this was just and equitable, and therefore reported the bill as it now stands before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not like to offer any interference in matters of this kind; but I have seen such legislation as this proposed very often. What is it? These things are worked up; and certain men are to receive benefit from it, or certain widows, or somebody. And I think it is the duty of any one who sees a thing of this kind, and who does not agree with it, to suggest an objection to it. Suppose the Senator from California had been a colonel in the late war receiving a salary of $2,000 a year, and in 1864 Congress should have increased the salary of colonels up to $4,000, would he have the face to come here and ask that he should be paid $4,000 for the time he served under a $2,000 salary? That is exactly this case. Here are three or four officers in the Navy who did not happen to be fortunate enough in certain engagements or captures to get a portion of prize-money received by other officers having a similar command under a law giving them a different rank, and now they ask us to pass a law relating back to that time, and give them $50,000 out of the Treasury. O, but my friend from California says, this is not out of the Treasury. Then, in God's name, where is it out of? Where does it come from, if it does not come from the Treasury? The very bill itself provides that the appropriation may be paid, "using for such purpose any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. CONKLING. That is stricken out.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; the Senator from California says it comes from the prize-money. What is the prize-money, except a sum set apart to pay specific things? But if that is exhausted, and they are entitled to more, where does it come from? It comes from the Treasury. Where does the pension fund come from that belongs to the marines or sailors? It is a part of the treasure of the Government, and a part of that is to be used for paying prize-money. It is all nonsense to say that this does not come out of the Treasury. It comes out of the Treasury just as much as if it were appropriated especially for the purpose out of the Treasury. I do say that this thing of passing laws nearly every session applicable to a few individuals belonging to the Navy has got to be so common, that everybody must expect it. A claim for distribution of prize-money, or for something or other, is worked up every session of Congress; and they come to Congress and apply for $50,000 or $100,000 out of the Treasury of the United States to pay somebody who was not entitled to one cent under the law at the time he did the service. That is precisely this case. But I see the Senator from New Jersey is anxious, and I will let him say what he desires to say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am not very anxious; I was only going to make a suggestion to my friend. I do not think anybody ought to criticise him for looking into this matter. At the last session of Congress I voted against the amendment which was proposed to the naval appropriation bill, because I had the same impression of it that he now has; I thought it was paying these men what they had no right to expect. But when I found that by making them fleet captains, and so detaching them from their ships, we had taken away from them the benefit of the law as it existed and had existed for sixty years, I thought it was only doing them simple justice to give them at any rate what they would have received if they had not been made fleet captains.

Then, as to the question whether the appropriation for fleet captains is too much or too little, I take it for granted that that subject was considered in 1864, when the amount was fixed, and that this bill is only doing justice by making that law revert back to 1861.

One word as to this money coming out of the Treasury. It is true, as the Senator says, that it comes out of the Treasury; but he must remember that it went into the Treasury in consequence of these officers being detached from their ships and being made fleet captains. The prize-money which they would have received went into that naval-pension fund.

Mr. LOGAN. Did these men seize the prize themselves, or did their commands?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly, or they could not have any claim to prize-money.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator knows very well that a fleet of vessels may be separated for two hundred miles, and if one captures a prize it is distributed among the whole.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On that point I have paid all the attention that anybody can pay. I had a conversation on this subject with the Senator from Vermont, who is quite critical in reference to these subjects, and he said he would not vote for this bill until he was satisfied that these men did not receive as captains their part of the prizes. So I went to the Navy Department and ascertained that they did not receive one cent, because they did not come within the provisions of the law, being detached from the ships' rolls by being made fleet captains.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly. A man in the Army or Navy, it makes no difference which, is always ambitious to have a higher command than he has, and there is not an officer in either service to-day who would not take promotion to a higher command, and receive nothing but his rations, rather than have a low command and high pay. That is well known. Here are gentlemen who, perhaps at their own solicitation, were assigned to higher commands, and in that way got higher rank and more power, and exercised more in the Navy than others; and after the war is over they come here and ask you to pay them money that they would have received if they had had the rank to the duties of which they were assigned. That is the position precisely.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to make a single statement about this matter?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is to give compensation in the way of prize-money to certain gentlemen who were captains in the service during the war, who did not get any prize-money. That is the proposition. Why do we do that? Simply because by the action of the Government these captains, who would have been entitled to prize-money, were by an order transferred to another service, and therefore they could not receive any prize-money. In 1864 we passed a law increasing the prize-money, that is, increasing the rates by which they should receive it. These captains who were put out of their positions, and so out of any possibility of receiving anything as prize-money by the action of the Government, come here and say, "We were not fairly treated; we were put aside from any opportunity of vindicating a claim for this money; now, there having been a provision for persons situated exactly as we were at the time, and that provision having been enlarged by the act of 1864, we say that the Government, who embarrassed us by their order, ought now to give us a claim on that pension fund." That is all there is of it, and it seems to me that it is but an act of justice.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word right there?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as he has gone I agree with him, that they are entitled to pay as captains, and that is the point I have been making all the time; but this bill gives them pay as fleet commanders, which makes a very great difference.

Mr. ANTHONY. As division commanders.

Mr. LOGAN. As division commanders; and gives them pay according to the rank. You propose to give rank and pay to men who had no such rank, and who were entitled to no such pay under the law. That is the point exactly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, we give them precisely the pay that the same grade of officers is entitled to by existing law. If you reduce their pay to that of a lower grade, then we ought to alter the law and reduce the prize-money allotted to other officers correspondingly.

The Senator says any officer of the Navy would, for the sake of promotion, give up his pay and fight upon rations alone. So he would. There is not an officer in the Army or Navy, fit to be there, who would not go into the fight not only without pay, but without rations, if necessary; but do we want them to do so? Do we want to deprive them of that——

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, nobody desires to deprive them of anything. I only referred to the fact that these men would take higher rank and higher command without pay, but they received the same pay as captains; and if you will make your prize-list according to their rank, nobody will object to it. But you are attempting now, inasmuch as they received not rank, but by assignment a higher command, to pay them according to their command without their having the rank. That is the difference.

Mr. ANTHONY. We desire to pay them, according to the existing prize law, the same pay that those who have performed the same service have had since, the same pay which they would be entitled to now if they should perform the same service again. There was a little hiatus, a time when these men were the only men engaged in the capture of prizes who did not receive a portion of prize-money. Of course it was a mistake. Congress did not mean to select out a certain class of officers and say that everybody else, from fleet captains down to seamen, shall have prize-money, but that the division commanders shall have none. As soon as that mistake was discovered it was corrected by legislation, and now we ask to give to these men who performed that duty in the hiatus between the two laws precisely what they would have had if the law had been passed in the beginning—precisely what would have been done if attention had been called to it. It is merely to correct an error.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President, I have been driven to make a suggestion that I did not intend to make. I see the pertinacity with which Senators persist in having pay taken out of the Treasury and given to men for rank that they never had; and I will state a little fact in connection with this matter. There was a fleet during the war, made up of soldiers of the Army, on the Mississippi River, that captured more prizes than the whole Navy put together, and they were deprived of prize-money until very recently; and when the distribution comes to be made to these men, who were as much entitled to it as any men, then it is thought very well to give a little over to officers of the Navy who did not have the rank to entitle them to it, so as to deprive these men of getting that to which they are entitled. That is the milk in the cocoa-nut.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the Senator think these men ought to have their prize-money?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; and I am willing to give it to them according to their rank, but you desire to give it to them according to their command, a thing not known in military or naval parlance.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to give it to them according to law. I desire to make the law applicable to these men precisely as it is applicable to all other men in the same situation.

Mr. WEST. Were they paid as captains?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; they were not paid at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I am willing they should be paid as captains; that was their rank, and let them have pay according to their rank, although it is not fair that they should have any prize-money if they did not participate in the captures. I have no objection, however, to their having pay as captains; but when you give them pay according to their command and deprive others, then it is an outrage, a wrong.

Mr. ANTHONY. Whom do you deprive by this law?

Mr. LOGAN. The men the law gave it to.

Mr. ANTHONY. They have got it.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; they have not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am sure it has been distributed, and these were the only men who have not received a portion.

Mr. LOGAN. It has been distributed among the rank of the Navy, the Navy proper; I understand that; but there are other people entitled besides the Navy proper.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then we will give it to them; at least I will.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be in order when the bill reaches the Senate. It is not in order at present.

Mr. STOCKTON. I did not suppose it would be necessary, after the clear statement made by the Senator from California, to say one word upon this subject, for it does seem to me to be the simplest proposition that ever was presented to the Senate; but inasmuch as I am a member of the committee that reported the bill, and as some gentlemen of the Senate do not seem to understand it, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for one moment while I present my views upon the subject.

The fact is, as stated in the communication which has been read, that at the present moment, of all the Navy of the United States, a few officers of high rank who were assigned to the important position, during the war, of fleet captains and division commanders, are the only ones who have not received any prize-money whatever. What is prize-money? Prize-money is that portion which every maritime service, including the service of our own country, has devoted of the proceeds of the captures made to be divided in a certain way among the officers and crew; and in the prize laws of our country every man who is engaged in this service is enumerated, from the man who commands a squadron to the fifer-boy who blows on the fife; and every man gets his prize-money in accordance with the rank which is assigned to him; and yet it has so happened, and it is admitted by everybody, that a few officers—very few in number—who had the most important and arduous duties in the service have never received one single cent. I think that is a proper case to be remedied in a bill professing to correct errors in the distribution of prizes. How did this occur? It occurred because there was no such rank in the service when the prize law was originally passed, as we had not a great number of fleets; and it was not necessary until the war broke out to have a great number of fleets and divisions of fleets, and there was no such officer as a division or fleet commander. It then became necessary to have such officers. You took the captain of a ship who, if he had stood on board his ship, would have received his prize-money; not, perhaps, as the Senator from Illinois says, precisely the same amount (but that we shall see about hereafter) as he will receive under this bill; but he would have received nearly the same amount as captain of a ship, and possibly from his opportunity he might have received more; but you took him from that place where he was absolutely entitled by law to a certain share of prize-money, and you gave him the position of a fleet captain or division commander. As that title was not then borne on the books, he received not a dollar of prize-money. He could not receive a dollar as captain in command of a ship when a prize was taken, for he was not then a captain in command of a ship. So that all that portion of the prizes that was to be distributed was distributed without his rank being considered.

Subsequent to that Congress saw the injustice of this omission and did legislate on the subject, and that legislation was that that fleet captain or that division commander should be borne upon the list and should receive his proportion of the prize-money; and under that officers of these grades received prize-money from that time on, so that Congress admitted the injustice and fixed the rate of prize-money for these grades; but by an error it omitted to include those who had been so assigned to these separate duties during that limited period, involving, I think, two or three years of the war. In that way they stand now isolated from all their companions, because their services were so valuable at that time, and are refused any share in the property they captured because, by reason of a technical error in the law, they have not been provided for. In other words, as my colleague well said, we have their money, to which in the judgment of this committee they were entitled except for the improper wording of the law; the law, in other words, not contemplating the exigencies which arose when the war broke out.

I do not think that any Senator who understands this case would be willing that they should not be paid; and I certainly do not understand the Senator from Illinois to take any such position. His position, if I understand him, is simply that he thinks they ought to be paid as captains, and not paid as fleet commanders. The question at the present moment here is precisely what that difference is. Perhaps some other gentleman on the committee may be able to state it, I cannot; but I think it must be very trifling. Whatever it may be, however, as the Senator from Rhode Island has said, Congress has legislated on the subject. There is a general law now in existence, by which we have decided that all these persons should be paid according to their rank and position, and should be assigned their share as fleet captains and division commanders; so that they can be paid in no other way. If they were not acting as captains of ships, they are not entitled to any prize-money, unless they get it under the very rank in which they were serving. What that shall be Congress has fixed; but that law of Congress does not cover this state of case, which existed for a few years previous to the passage of the act.

That is the whole case—to make the general prize law, as adopted by the Congress of the United States since this difficulty was discovered, applicable to this little interim, and not let these officers remain isolated examples, as they now are, deprived alone of all the Navy of any share in the prizes which they themselves assisted in capturing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. WEST. The unfinished business, as I understand, is the resolution on finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The centennial bill.

Mr. WEST. I did not understand that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The centennial bill is the unfinished business.

Mr. WEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to urge the attention of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill which now lies on the table; and with that view I move to postpone the pending and all prior orders, and take up the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. RAMSEY. There is morning business yet to be done.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to say a word upon this motion, if it is to be pressed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is before the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. I am asked to yield to morning business, and I do not object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will receive the morning business pending this motion.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 562) providing that the name of Brevet Major-General Horatio P. Van Cleve may be placed upon the retired list of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SUPPLY OF WATER TO WASHINGTON.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to ascertain and report to the Senate, at his earliest convenience, what danger, if any, exists of a water famine in this city; what is the average quantity of water that flows over the Great Falls of the Potomac River per day, and what is the height of the same above tide when the dam from the Virginia to the Maryland shore is completed; what quantity of water per day is necessary to feed the Washington Aqueduct and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal at the Great Falls of the Potomac, and what is the size and discharging capacity per day of the Washington Aqueduct; how high is the bank of the distributing reservoir above tide-level; what is the capacity and distance of the same from the Great Falls and from the center of Washington City; how many water-mains have been laid from the distributing reservoir, the size and discharging capacity in the center of Washington City, and what proportion of their discharging capacity per day is consumed at present by the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

Mr. HAMLIN. It occurs to me that almost every fact there called for is now within our possession; and I do not think of a single item, except the quantity of water daily used. I believe all the other facts are now in print from the reports of the engineers and officers of the Government who have been connected with that work. I think the resolution had better lie over until to-morrow and let us look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine objects, and the resolution will lie over.

INFORMATION AS TO PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. WEST submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be directed to report upon the expediency of furnishing to each member of the Senate a copy of "Practical information concerning the public debt of the United States, with the national banking laws," published by W. H. & O. H. Morrison.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2330) to extend the provisions of section 21 of chapter 200 of the acts passed at the second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, giving to unnaturalized persons enlisting in the naval service or Marine Corps of the United States the same rights as are now given by law to such persons enlisted in the Army of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2225) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," approved July 1, 1870.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution for the printing and binding of twenty-five hundred copies in quarto (uniform with the series) of Professor Hayden's final report on the Cretaceous Flora of the West; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] to postpone the unfinished business, being the centennial bill, and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SCOTT. The motion made by the Senator from Louisiana proposes to postpone a question which has been already two days under consideration for the purpose of taking up an appropriation bill. I think I need not say to the Senate that our past experience satisfies us that it is a bad economy of time to have a measure under consideration for several days and then postpone it for the purpose of taking up another; for when we get back to the consideration of that which we have laid aside, we have to go over very much the same ground that has been already traversed in the consideration of it. Apart from that, I hope it is evident to the Senate that it is important that this bill, which has been under consideration, should be disposed of speedily. The character to be given to this bill is of importance. What it proposes to aid is to be a national or an international exhibition; and the character which shall be given to it is to affect legislation which will follow, and both of these it is important to have settled very soon. I think there is no necessity for displacing it, and I did not apprehend that the motion to displace it would come from the quarter that it does. It was taken up in consequence of the postponement of the financial debate—I will not say the financial bill, for the debate covers everything. If any measure was to antagonize it this morning, I supposed it would be the financial bill. Now, I understand that at least two Senators are absent who have hitherto participated in that debate, and who desire still to participate in it, and in consequence of their inability to be present, (for they are both ill,) the chairman of the Committee on Finance does not deem it his duty to antagonize that measure with the consideration of the centennial bill. As he does not, I hope there will be no hesitation about going on with the bill and voting down this motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Pennsylvania has stated correctly that I would not call up the discussion on the financial question because of the absence of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] and the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] The Senator from Michigan, I think, has the floor, or intends to take the floor very soon, and is unable to appear here to-day. In regard to the course of business, instead of consuming a great deal of time in discussing the order of business, my opinion is that as the centennial question is up now we had better dispose of it. If no one else does, I intend, before the debate proceeds much further, to move to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, so that we shall have a distinct and definite plan before us before we act further on the question of the centennial exposition. If that motion should be adopted it would soon pass away from the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. Perhaps that might be done by common consent now.

Mr. SHERMAN. When that is done, there will be no objection to taking up the Army bill. I trust Senators will see that if we are to antagonize these various propositions with each other we shall consume a great deal of time. I imagine that the centennial bill or the motion to refer it can be soon voted upon. If that should be voted down, of course it will take more time, and the Senator from Louisiana can then take his own choice about antagonizing the Army bill with it. It strikes me that we can dispose of the centennial bill in the course of an hour, either by passing it or referring it with a view to get an appropriation, and then go on with the Army bill.

Mr. WEST. It has been very truly remarked that the debate on the centennial bill has occupied the Senate for two successive days, and I do not think any Senator on this floor concludes that that debate will terminate with this day's session. As a consequence, at the close of the morning business to-morrow we shall have the interminable question of finance once again before the Senate. Then we can by no means conclude upon any definite time when the Army appropriation bill can be acted upon. In the mean time the other appropriation bills will be accumulating upon the Senate, and we shall have such a mass of business here as will necessarily exclude all the current business. I leave the matter, however, to the Senate. I am acting under instructions from my committee, but with no aversion or antagonism to the centennial bill whatever. I leave the question to the decision of the Senate entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana to lay aside the pending and all previous orders, and proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SUMNER. There was a suggestion made on the other side that seemed to me not without force, founded on the obvious character of the pending centennial bill. Of course, we all see now that it is an appropriation bill in disguise; it is a masked appropriation bill; and it is so to be treated. It seems to me, therefore, that it should go at once, and just as fast as it can, to the Committee on Appropriations, that they may consider it and see whether that committee will take the responsibility of calling upon the country at this moment to pay sums counted out by millions for an object which certainly a large number of Senators, if not a majority, are against. I say, counting out by millions; for although they only call now for $3,000,000, yet no person familiar with the subject supposes that, if once committed to that extent, we can stop. I have heard a very experienced person, as familiar with this question as any one, knowing the course of things in Europe, say that we cannot go to the end without $30,000,000. Under these circumstances it seems to me the Appropriation Committee is the committee for us. Let this business go to that committee without delay. I hope, therefore, that the Senators from Pennsylvania will see that this measure is committed, without any discussion, without taking any time, to the committee that has charge of the appropriations of the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator appeals to the Senators from Pennsylvania, and I have listened to remarks which perhaps were not quite in order, but they suggest a question which I should like to put to the Senator from Massachusetts. I have learned, very distinctly, that he is against an international exhibition. Is he against a national exhibition on the 4th of July, 1876?

Mr. SUMNER. On the contrary, I am for it; and wish an exhibition that shall redound to the grandeur of this country, and that shall commemorate its institutions, so that all throughout the world shall see and know it.

Mr. SCOTT. Then, if the Senator desires to have such an exhibition on the 4th of July, 1876, it has been distinctly announced upon this floor that the machinery thus far provided for the purpose of defraying the expenses of that exhibition has been insufficient; and does he desire to send this bill to the Committee on Appropriations with his amendment, that the Government of the United States shall not pay one dollar of the expenses, and without an indication from the Senate of whether a majority of the Senate are with him or against him on that subject? It seems to me it would be an idle thing to send this bill to the Committee on Appropriations without an indication from the Senate either of the character of the exhibition or of their willingness to appropriate money to either a national or an international exhibition.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, whether the bill goes to the committee with my amendment or not is a matter of great indifference. I only wish that it should go to the committee with the existing legislation on the subject, by which we are bound to the people of the United States not to assume any liability on account of this undertaking. To that is the faith of Congress now pledged, and the Senator from Pennsylvania makes a mistake when he calls upon us to carry out an assumed faith toward these contractors. The obligation is the other way. The faith assumed by Congress is that the Government of the United States shall not be called on to make any contribution. I think we ought to adhere to the end, whether this exhibition is national or international, to the declaration of Congress twice over—not once, but twice—embodied in these very acts, so that all these contractors had ample notice thereof.

Mr. CAMERON. I have been very much surprised at the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts. He says this has been a masked appropriation bill. That is not correct. We asked for no appropriation when this bill came here; we did not desire to have an appropriation; but the Senator from Massachusetts seems determined that it shall be an appropriation. He says he is in favor of a national and not an international exhibition. I ask him, if he is in favor of that, and if he is anxious that it should be carried out to the honor and glory of the country, will he vote one dollar, or how many dollars will he vote for a national exhibition?

We have asked so far nothing. When the question has been forced upon us, when gentlemen have talked about $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, we have said that in no event will there be asked by the gentlemen who have charge of this exhibition more than $3,000,000. I stated that yesterday in my place; and yet the Senator gets up and to-day says it will involve $30,000,000. I believe my judgment is as good as that of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I know my word is as good as his on any question; and I will not allow him or anybody else to come and put a character upon this bill which does not belong to it. I have said from the beginning that we desire this bill passed so that the people who have charge of the enterprise—and they are composed of members, two, I believe, from every State in the Union—shall know what they may depend upon and what they shall do for the purpose of making this not only respectable, but creditable and glorious to the country. This way of a Senator saying that he is in favor of a national exhibition, and that he is willing to make it creditable to the country, without saying that he will be willing to vote money to make it creditable, or saying that he will give one cent or one dollar toward it, strikes me as very strange.

I repeat again, we want this question decided. If Congress will not do anything for us when we come to ask them, we will do for ourselves the best we can, and we will take care of the honor of the United States, if other Senators will not help us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, to postpone the pending and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. WEST. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, Mr. WRIGHT. I should vote "yea" if at liberty to do so.

Mr. THURMAN. On all questions connected with this bill I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, Mr. MORTON. If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. RAMSEY. On all questions pertaining to this bill I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. MERRIMON. If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay" on this motion.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Carpenter, Davis, Hager, Howe, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Sargent, Sprague, Stevenson, Sumner, West, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Cameron, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, Morrill of Vermont, Pease, Pratt, Ransom, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, and Stockton—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Chandler, Conover, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—27.

So the motion of Mr. WEST was not agreed to.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. CARPENTER. On Friday last I gave notice that on Monday of this week I should move the Senate to proceed to consider the bill for a new election in Louisiana. The Senator from Indiana was then confined at his house, and is to-day, but, I understand, expects to be here to-morrow. If he comes here to-morrow I shall make the motion then.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I give notice that after the disposition of the financial question I propose calling up the resolution for the admission of Pinchback as Senator from Louisiana, on which I will submit some remarks.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition is now before the Senate, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to strike out from the word "extend," in line 3, to the word "exposition," in line 6, the words "in the name of the United States a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition," and in lieu thereof to insert "a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of each one of the United States to be represented and take part in the national exposition;" so as to make the bill read:

That the President be requested to extend a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of each one of the United States to be represented and take part in the national exposition to be held at Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the year 1876.

Mr. SHERMAN. The debate yesterday, Mr. President, convinced me at least that the Senate ought not to pass the bill that is pending now before it in its present shape. This bill commits us to hold an international fair without any limitation as to cost, without any plan or arrangement. The introduction of this bill is a substantial abandonment of the old plan to conduct a world's fair in Philadelphia. The old basis contemplated that this exposition should be paid for by the voluntary contributions of States and individuals. It is now conceded on all hands that the plan of the centennial board of finance to raise this money has failed, and therefore an appeal must be made to the Government of the United States to aid in paying the expenses. The law of its organization prohibited and denied on the part of the United States any claim, and expressly excluded it from appropriating any money, for this purpose. It seems to me, therefore, that the plan of conducting this centennial exposition having been abandoned, the question is now a new one, with the Government partially committed by an invitation issued under existing laws.

Mr. President, I believe, with every Senator who has spoken on this subject, that there ought to be a grand exposition, a grand celebration, a universal feeling of joy and congratulation on our one hundredth anniversary that our Government, starting with such humble beginnings, has grown to be so great a power. It is an event that is worthy of celebration. But the mode and manner in which it was proposed originally that the celebration should be conducted has been practically abandoned by those having it in charge. The introduction of this bill is sufficient evidence of it. The declaration made to us by the Senators from Pennsylvania that they expect an appropriation from Congress to aid in it is a practical abandonment of the old plan. Under these circumstances, while we think this celebration ought to be conducted, and conducted with a considerable degree of magnificence, commensurate with the occasion and the importance of the event to be commemorated, it is perfectly manifest that the plan blocked out heretofore must also be abandoned, and that the Government of the United States must step forward in some way and assume the burden of this exhibition and conduct it from the public Treasury. That might as well be conceded.

It seems to me, therefore, that the better way would be to refer this whole subject, including this bill, to one of the committees of the Senate, and let that committee submit to us a plan under which States and individuals may join with the Government of the United States in holding this exposition as a part of the centennial celebration. We may, no doubt, to some extent, avail ourselves of the labor of those who have gone before us, the labor of this commission, composed of two members from each of the States, and of the board of finance incorporated by the previous act of Congress, and use their organization as the basis of this exposition. But, sir, we are at perfect liberty to change the plan, to change the mode, to change the manner, to change the name, to change the organization to any extent we see proper.

I shall therefore move that this bill, together with the whole subject of the centennial exposition, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations without instructions; and I say in advance, that if that committee shall report a carefully prepared plan, with suitable limitations, for the management of this exposition, I will vote for it, even if the amount involved is pretty large. I think the Government of the United States, though not under the law committed, yet is practically committed, in public opinion if not by the law, to aid in this exposition. I think that Philadelphia is the proper place to hold it, and that we may very well avail ourselves of all the work and all the preparation that have been made to hold it in Philadelphia, and to hold part of it at least in the form of an exposition of the products of American industry. I am therefore prepared to vote for any carefully prepared bill that contains qualifications and limitations, guards and protections, which will pledge the United States to pay a pretty large sum of money for that purpose.

But certainly I never intended to vote for a proposition to invite all the nations of the world to participate in a world's fair at Philadelphia, without any limitation as to amount, without any plan, without any organization, without some security that States and individuals would pay a considerable portion of the expense. It seems to me the statements already made by the Senators from Pennsylvania, by the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from California are absolutely conclusive against the idea that we should commit ourselves in this wholesale, blind way to conducting such an exposition, without having any power or control over it.

The bill now before us, if passed, binds us hand and foot. The Government of the United States then undertakes, under its auspices, to carry into execution this international exposition under an organization now complete, and if the trustees and board of finance of that organization should make contracts for an expenditure of $50,000,000, although it is scarcely to be supposed that they will, and I know from the character of the gentlemen composing the commission they will not, yet this bill places it in their power to contract obligations which the Government of the United States would have to meet to any amount whatever, without limitation or restriction. These gentlemen are not officers of the Government; they are not under the pay of the Government; they are not under the control of the Government; and although we might seek hereafter to limit the amount of appropriations, to guard and protect them, yet having once proclaimed to all the nations of the world that we intend to hold an international exposition at Philadelphia at the time stated, and under the organization already existing, we are in the position of a bountiful host inviting guests to his table without any preparation whatever, without counting the cost, and without even being certain that he will be able to pay the cost.

With these few remarks—and I did not intend to participate in this debate—I will submit the motion to refer, assuring the Senators from Pennsylvania that I do not desire at all to defeat this proposed exposition. I believe the general sentiment of the people of Ohio is that not only the State but the people and the nation ought to contribute more or less to paying the expenses of a grand celebration in 1876 of the centennial anniversary of American independence; and of all the places that have been named, ninety-nine out of a hundred of them would suggest that Philadelphia was the place. They are perfectly willing to bear their share of the expense; but, like prudent people, they want to know how much it will cost, the mode and manner in which it shall be conducted, whether as a national or international exposition, the character of the buildings to be erected, who are to erect them, what plans have been devised, the extent of the plans, and, more than all, the cost and management of the exposition. If they are assured that it will be conducted with fair liberality, and yet at the same time with wise economy, I have no doubt the people of Ohio would be very glad, through the national Treasury and the State authorities and by individuals, to aid in this exposition; and when the Committee on Appropriations shall report such a scheme as that, I shall give it my hearty assent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio moves that the pending bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations without instructions.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, when the proposition to have an exhibition to commemorate the centennial anniversary of our independence was first mooted, it was proposed to have it at Washington; and I opposed it for the reason that Washington was not in a condition to entertain the guests who would come here; that the expense of preparation and maintaining a creditable exhibition would be so great that it would be too burdensome upon a city like this. It was discussed for some time, and was finally abandoned or beaten. That was the first proposition.

The next proposition was to have an exhibition at Philadelphia. New York and Philadelphia were competing for the exhibition. The proposition was to have it entirely supported by the voluntary contributions of individuals, corporations, and States; that the Government of the United States should have nothing to do with it. I thought I saw then very clearly that if the Government of the United States was to have nothing to do with it, Philadelphia was not the place in which to hold it; that New York was the great center of wealth, the great center of water and railroad communication, the commercial depot of the whole nation, and New York was better calculated to carry on an exhibition of this kind voluntarily than Philadelphia. I did not believe that Philadelphia could carry out the project. It was said that she could; that she could do it as well as New York. I doubted then that any city in the United States would be able to do it by voluntary contributions. I was quite confident that Philadelphia could not. Philadelphia could do more toward it than Washington. My objection to Washington was because Washington could do very little toward it by voluntary contributions. There were many things in the history of Philadelphia that made it the appropriate place, it is true, but the great wealth of New York as compared with Philadelphia made that the more appropriate point. But it was said that Philadelphia could very well do this. She has undertaken it, and she has failed to accomplish it. Arrangements have been made for an international exhibition, and invitations or suggestions to foreign governments to come here and participate have been sent out, and some of them have signified their willingness to come.

Now, it must be remembered that when we celebrate in our way the birth of the nation, we shall most certainly claim that we gained our independence by arms. We shall declare in our speeches that we whipped Great Britain, and detail the mode of whipping Great Britain, how we humiliated her on this battle-field and on that battle-field, although, as suggested by a Senator, it might not in all cases be exactly true; we might feel inclined to exaggerate, as we probably would. We want on that day the liberty of exaggeration; we do not want to offend anybody. We shall want to brag a good deal about what we have done, and it would not be exactly the entertainment for those who were whipped, as we shall claim, whether they were or not. We had the final success; that is certain. Whether we were victors on every battle-field is a question; but we shall claim that we were victorious everywhere and on all occasions, and our people will want to talk in that strain. There will be an outpouring of feeling of that kind, which is not exactly the kind of thing to invite Great Britain to. Now we are on the most friendly relations with Great Britain. The negotiations which resulted in the Geneva award have produced a most friendly feeling. But I do not believe our centennial celebration is exactly the occasion on which to invite Great Britain. I think there is a great deal in that suggestion. A world's fair would be; but a celebration of our victory I do not believe is just the thing to invite them to. But that is a matter of taste more than anything else.

It is very evident that a world's fair or an international exhibition is going to be a very expensive thing. It is going to cost a great deal more than a national exhibition. I believe we are abundantly able to have a national exhibition. I do not think, in our present embarrassed condition, we are in a position to spend fifteen or twenty million dollars, and we must do that to go through it properly; and we may as well face the question just as it comes before us. If we are to invite all the nations of the world, and make such a show as shall be creditable to our country, we must spend fifteen or twenty millions, and we will do it. I shall be surprised if it does not reach twenty-five or thirty millions before we are through with it, because on that occasion we shall be bound to outstrip the world. We shall feel so good and so grand over the one hundredth birthday of our American independence that we will not allow the exhibition to be a failure. We will entertain all the world on that occasion. At all events, we will provide an entertainment for them, whether they come here to accept of it or not. We are bound to do it if we go a step farther. The Government of the United States now is not committed to the pecuniary aspect of the question at all. On the contrary, it was stated that the Government should not in any event be liable for anything; that the Government was not to contribute anything. If the undertaking cannot be carried on by individuals, the Government must take hold of it.

Now, in taking hold of the question, I say we are perfectly free to take hold of that proposition which we can carry out creditably to ourselves, and that is a national exhibition, upon which we must spend, since it has come to this, two or three or five million dollars. Let us limit it to a national exhibition, and let us make that exhibition creditable to the nation. Let us invite nobody, spend no money to entertain the world; but let us meet together and rejoice as we should on that great day. It has got into such a position that to make it creditable as a national exhibition something must be done. I am aware of that, and I am willing now to vote for a reasonable amount of money to make it a creditable national exhibition. If this bill can be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to prepare a bill fixing the amount to be paid, and the times at which it shall be paid, with safeguards under which it shall be paid, so that the whole country can know exactly who is responsible for the money, how it is to be used, and for what purpose—if that can be clearly understood, and the money spent for the purpose which is intended, I think the nation will be satisfied; I think we shall all be satisfied.

It is very evident that nothing creditable can be done now by private subscriptions. That plan has failed. The place has been selected, and for a national exhibition no place is more appropriate than Philadelphia. Let us make Philadelphia, then, the center of all the celebrations on this great holiday. Let us celebrate it as a nation, and rejoice over our victories and our successes, our victories in arms, our victories in peace, and our material resources. Let a reasonable appropriation be made, with proper guards, in a well-prepared bill. Let the bill come before the invitation. Let the bill come first, and let us know, when we are assuming new responsibilities what they are.

We have no right to extend invitations to the world unless we mean to pay for the exhibition, and we as legislators have no right to vote for that invitation until we know the amount we are to pay for it, and know whether the resources of the Government in the present condition of the finances of the country will justify it. We have no right to place the nation in a false position here.

There will be no harm done if we come up frankly and say, "We have concluded that it is more appropriate, all things considered, that this shall be a national exhibition; that it shall be a celebration of our national independence; that it shall be a patriotic movement on the part of the people; and on that occasion we will exhibit our wares, we will exhibit our products, we will exhibit our industries, and we will rejoice over our political and civil liberties." If we confine it to that, and confine our appropriations to certainties, and not deal in generalities and uncertainties, the country will be satisfied. But if we extend more invitations, if we take another step blindly in that direction, we shall be censured, and justly censured.

We ought not to have done what we have already done. We ought to have understood in the beginning that a national exhibition could not be held without the aid of Congress. I did not believe then that it could, and we made a mistake in going as far as we have. Everybody sees the mistake now. The manly way to rectify it is to acknowledge that it was a mistake; to say that that is not the thing that we want in 1876; we want a national exhibition, and we will make it the grandest national exhibition the world ever saw. That we can do; but we cannot make it the grandest international exhibition the world ever saw. We cannot succeed in that. There are elements of discord in that idea. We shall not have unity of purpose. It is expensive; it is discordant; it is not exactly the thing. The hearts of the whole American people will not be in such an exhibition. We see it by the diversity of opinion here.

On a question of this kind there should be almost absolute unanimity in this Chamber and in the other, and in the whole country. The diversity of opinion expressed through the press, the resolutions of the different States, the distrust that is now manifest, admonish us that the next step should be in the right direction.

Let us make it a national exhibition. Let us guard the expenditure of the money and have it expended for certain purposes to be specified in the act, and we shall have the co-operation of the whole country, which is more important now than anything else; we shall have the co-operation of every Legislature, we shall have the co-operation of every leading journal, we shall have the co-operation of every Senator.

We can all unite and agree upon this: that we are able to have a national exhibition; we are able to make it a grand event in the history of this country. We are a unit upon that question. Let us stand where we can stand together, and make it a success. The other plan will involve the country in an expenditure of fifteen, twenty, or thirty millions, bring scandal, discord, and discontent, and do more harm than good. That is my opinion of it.

I hope, therefore, that the bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that they will report a bill which shall appropriate a sufficient amount, under proper safeguards, to give us a national exhibition of which we shall be proud.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THURMAN in the chair.) The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend that motion by adding, "with instructions to report a bill providing for a national exhibition."

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we had better refer the bill without any instructions.

Mr. STEWART. Very well. I withdraw my motion.

[Mr. STEVENSON addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DENNIS in the chair.) The question is on the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the immediate question before the Senate is on the reference of this bill to the Committee on Appropriations. Suppose that motion is carried, what duty will then devolve upon that committee? I wish to advert first to that point before I undertake to make any reply to some of the remarks that have fallen from the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] and some others that perhaps I may deem necessary to refer to.

The question which the Senate has been considering for several days is, whether this exhibition shall continue to have the character of an international exhibition. Are we to devolve that question upon the Committee on Appropriations? Are they to assume the responsibility which the Senate is not willing to meet? I do not wish to repeat the argument I made to show that whatever may have been the individual declaration of Senators upon the floor, the law passed by Congress has enacted that this shall be an international exhibition. I do not wish to repeat what I have already said about the position in which those having charge of this exhibition are now placed, and from which they seek to be relieved by the action of Congress. I do not wish again to refer unnecessarily to what has been done by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, the governor of that State, and the President, in pursuance of the notice which was given to him. But I do wish again to ask the Senate to remember that in pursuance of what has already been done, six of the powers of the earth have signified their acceptance of what our ministers abroad construed as an invitation; and since I have been in my place this morning the evidence has been placed in my hands of acceptance by two additional nations of this invitation, Austria and the Sandwich Islands. I have before me copies of the acceptance of both those powers.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask him whether this invitation is supposed to entail upon the Government of the United States the personal entertainment of the foreign delegations. I apprehend that nothing of the kind is intended; that when you give a public and governmental invitation, it is just such as the Government of the United States received from Austria, and from France, and from Great Britain, and that it does not involve the personal invitation of the sovereign or any one of his or her suite any more than it involved the personal invitation of the President of the United States or of the Vice-President or of any other dignitary of our country. Therefore when we speak of entertaining crowned heads, which I have heard spoken of with some horror because of the necessary expenses supposed to accompany it, it seems to me (if I understand the question aright, and I ask it to obtain information for myself and for other members of the body) that the invitations which are sought to be extended here are simply official invitations that they shall send their commissioners with the usual machinery to see that the delegations of persons and such merchandise as may happen to come to this country may be properly cared for and distributed. I should like an answer from my friend on that subject, for I know he is competent to give it.

I will ask him, furthermore, whether he has not in his hand an exact copy of the invitation issued to the United States by the countries I have named, to show the precise character of what these invitations amount to, and whether or not the expenses of individuals who are asked is expected to be borne by the United States Government or by the government extending the invitation?

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Delaware has, by giving his own impressions of the extent of these invitations, to a large degree, answered the question which he put to me. I think I have already stated, and if I have not, I certainly have no hesitation in stating now, my belief that the invitations proposed to be extended to governments have nothing in them personal to the rulers of those countries, but they are intended to be simple invitations through the rulers to their people to come and participate in this exhibition, and the only official act which the governments of those countries are expected to do is to appoint the commissioners, who here may, in an official character, represent and take charge of the interests of such of the citizens of those countries as may come to participate in the exhibition.

So far as the expense is concerned of those commissioners or of the participants in the exhibition, I take it for granted that we expect and intend to do no more than the Emperor of Austria, than the Emperor of France, or than the Queen of Great Britain did when the expositions were held in their countries, and none of them defrayed the expenses of our commissioners.

Upon the other point, as to the invitation that was sent. The Senator from California, in the course of his remarks yesterday, read the invitation sent by the Austrian and French governments to this country, and in neither of them was an expectation expressed that this Government would do anything more than be represented at and send commissioners to those exhibitions.

Mr. SARGENT. I think that is a very important point, and really designates the departure which we are taking by this new legislation from the course which other governments have pursued toward us. By the notice which we received from the French minister we were asked to give our concurrence in the exhibition and to send commissioners. By the notice which we received from Austria we were notified that such a thing was decreed, and we were requested to send commissioners, and there they stopped. There was no invitation, "cordial" or otherwise, to this Government to be represented and take part in the exhibition. But by the legislation which is now proposed we are to extend "a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations"—to do what? To send commissioners? Not at all, but to be themselves represented and to take part; not to send commissioners to look after the works of art or the articles of industry that may be sent. It is put upon a different footing entirely. If this departure means anything, it means that we invite them here as our guests, to be present and at our charge. If this bill simply provided, in the language of the documents to which I referred yesterday, that the foreign nations should be requested to send commissioners to see that those who send from their shores articles of industry or art should have proper accommodations or should have some organ of communication with this Government, it would be a very different proposition. But the proposition now before us invites those governments themselves to be present and take part in the exhibition. If that language is there, it certainly is worthy of criticism; it certainly is a proper subject for criticism; and I call the attention of the Senate to the difference between the language of this bill and the language of the invitations to which I have already referred.

Mr. SCOTT. I have before me the language both of the bill and of the invitation which was read by the Senator from California, and if there be anything in the language of the bill now before the Senate which is inapt or goes too far, I know of no Senator on this floor who is more capable of correcting it and making it both apt and appropriate than the Senator from California.

But now let me contrast the two invitations, and see whether the one proposed means anything more than that which was given by the French government to our own Government. I read, as contained in the remarks of the Senator from California, the clause which I consider the invitation given by the French government to our own:

> The government of His Majesty charges me to give notice officially of these aforesaid decrees to the Cabinet of Washington, to invite its valuable concurrence, and to designate an authority with which the imperial commission could have a direct understanding.

The "Cabinet of Washington" of course is treated as the Government of the United States. Its "valuable concurrence" in this exhibition is invited, and it is requested "to designate an authority with which the imperial commission could have a direct understanding." The Cabinet of Washington, receiving this invitation, certainly might just as readily construe it into a personal invitation to each member of the Government to be present, as the Queen of England or any other of the crowned heads of Europe could construe the proposed invitation here to be personal. Let me read it. What is the President authorized to do?

> To extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition, to be held at Philadelphia under the auspices of the Government of the United States.

Now, what is the difference? "To be represented and take part in"—that is what we ask them to do. They asked us to give the valuable concurrence of the Cabinet of Washington in their exhibition, and to designate an authority with which the imperial commission could have a direct understanding. I have no objection to taking the very words of the French invitation, if it will suit the Senator from California better, and ask the "valuable concurrence" of these governments in this exhibition, and to designate an authority with which correspondence could be held. But there is the point.

I do not wish to repeat again anything that I have said about crowned heads coming here. I said I hoped they would come. I have no objection to their coming. But certainly it must be the farthest thing from the expectation or intention of any Senator here, if the Khedive of Egypt, the Sultan, or any king or emperor, should see proper to come here, that the Government would be expected to appropriate money for the purpose of entertaining him in the manner in which he would look to be entertained if making a visit to one of his crowned companions. The whole spirit and genius of our institutions revolt at the idea; and I am amazed at anybody entertaining such a proposition for a moment. It argues to me a vehemence of zeal against this exhibition that I confess is to me somewhat incomprehensible.

But, sir, I want to get back to this question of what the Committee on Appropriations will be expected to do and what kind of instructions they will consider themselves under if this bill is sent to them; and I am glad the chairman of that committee is now present. Here are two acts of Congress, each one of which recognizes an international exhibition—the first act and the act creating the corporation. They impose certain duties upon these commissioners. They have gone on to discharge them. They have provided regulations, and communicated them to the President, which anticipate and prepare for the attendance of foreign nations at this exhibition; and now after eight governments have accepted them, one of two things must be done: either the people of these governments are to come and participate in this exhibition and find such accommodations as these commissioners can make for them under the acts as they stand, or they are to be told that we do not wish them to come and that no appropriation of space in the exhibition will be set apart for them.

I think it is due to the gentlemen having charge of the exhibition that they shall know whether they are to set apart in the buildings which are to be prepared space for foreign exhibitors or not. If it is to be a national exhibition to the exclusion of an international one, certainly it is due to them and to all the world that it should be announced now. Are we to send that question to the Committee on Appropriations? Does the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations want that question sent there with the light which this discussion has shed upon it, and without specific instructions, for his decision?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope not.

Mr. SCOTT. He says he hopes not, and I hope not; I trust the Senate will meet that question, let it be determined which way it may. I am not here with any undue zeal, I hope, for either aspect of this case; but it is perfectly apparent that if an international exhibition is to go on, one amount of appropriation and one species of preparation must be made to meet it; if that is to be excluded, then another amount of appropriation and another species of preparation must be made to meet that; and, in the present posture of affairs, the Senate should decide what character this exhibition shall have. If the vote of the Senate declares that it shall be national only, the commissioners will understand that and prepare for it. The bill may finally go to the Committee on Appropriations; I may not perhaps dissent from that, after the character of the exhibition shall have been determined by the Senate, because that will indicate to the Committee on Appropriations what they are expected to do, whether they are to provide in the appropriation which they make for an international or for a national exhibition. It has been so far discussed that I think it would hardly be worth while to pass this bill and then go over the discussion again on an appropriation bill. It may as well be made to cover both points at once, to determine the character of the exhibition, and make the appropriation which will be needed to carry it out.

Something has been said about the amount that will be required for the purpose of carrying on this exhibition. Last evening the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] put the question to me what the estimates were of the amount that would be needed for the purpose of erecting the buildings. I did not answer him at that time, for the reason that I did not want to make any inaccurate statements. I said to him that I was not exactly prepared to respond to the inquiry, but that I hoped to be able to do so. I had been making some inquiries on that very point, and wished to make that statement as accurate as I possibly could before I answered it. Now, Mr. President, I have had placed in my hands by gentlemen who have been connected with this exhibition the estimates which have been made for the purpose of putting up these buildings. I will not read the whole of the estimates in detail; but including the main pavilion, which is to cover thirty acres, and include all the necessary offices for management, foreign and State commissions, sanitary arrangements, and restaurants, which at other exhibitions have required separate buildings, the estimate is $3,500,000.

Mr. SARGENT. What is the material?

Mr. SCOTT. That I am not prepared to answer, because I believe their advertisements for proposals contemplated several classes of buildings; and I am not prepared to answer which one this estimate was based upon. I have understood that there has been a very careful estimate, and a very careful preparation made to render this building both appropriate for the purpose and entirely secure; and that it contemplates a substantial, useful, and safe building in all respects.

The estimate for the machinery hall is $850,000; for the agricultural hall, $400,000; for the horticultural hall, $200,000—making $4,950,000 for the buildings. Then follow the estimates for water supply, sewerage, drainage, &c., which are not properly the buildings themselves, but are accessories to them, and enter into the general expenses, making it up to $6,500,000; and that includes the incidental expenses for two and a half years and the expenses of the general administration during three years. After all this estimate had been made, 25 per cent. was added for contingencies, making $8,125,000 as the full estimated cost.

Mr. SARGENT. Does that include the furnishing of the buildings, and gas fixtures?

Mr. SCOTT. It includes gas fixtures, expenses of building offices, &c.

Mr. SARGENT. Furniture and carpets?

Mr. SCOTT. They do not expect to have carpets.

Mr. SARGENT. They must have in the offices.

Mr. SCOTT. I have not got an inventory of what is expected to be in these buildings; but this estimate covers, as I understand from these gentlemen, all that is necessary to put the exhibition into successful operation, and I do not think they intended to be extravagant; for I am sure, from all the experience abroad in exhibitions of this kind, they would not expect to carpet this building.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not suppose they intend to carpet a floor covering thirty acres; but I do suppose that the offices of administration would be carpeted very luxuriously, and all these offices will require furniture, and this general hall will require stands and counters and fountains and many other accessories of that sort, all of which are costly.

I should like to have the Senator state how many acres the Vienna building covered, if he can, and why that cost so many millions, admittedly, even on his own figures, and this one is to cost but three millions. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I should like information on that point.

Mr. SCOTT. Before this exhibition gets through, as the Senator from California has been giving his attention to the chairs and sofas, and the carpets, and all the details that are to go into the buildings, I hope the commission will secure his valuable services; for I have no doubt he will be able to give them very great aid. I desire to get candidly before the Senate the general features of this bill; but I do not expect to be able to answer how many chairs, sofas, and carpets are expected to be used in this enterprise.

Mr. SARGENT. If my friend will allow me a moment, I am giving my attention to the Treasury of the United States; and I consider it my duty to do so as a Senator of the United States. I yielded very cheerfully every time the Senator desired to ask me a question yesterday; and by looking over my remarks he will find that he interjected a great many into mine, and I answered a great many questions. Now as this was a very important consideration, what was this thing going to cost, I was calling the attention of the Senator to the elements of the cost. If he was not prepared to answer, a simple negative would be sufficient. It was not necessary to reflect upon my motives, or to imply that I assumed any superior knowledge or that my services might be useful or not to this commission, to which I do not belong and in which I have not the slightest desire to figure.

Mr. SCOTT. I certainly have yielded with entire courtesy to the Senator every time he wished to ask a question. All I desired was to protest against the length of time which would be taken up if we were to go so far into details as to come down to the question of carpets. I am not in a bad humor. I cannot answer the question of the Senator on that point.

Mr. SARGENT. It was not necessary to make a personal reflection or to intimate that my services would be useful somewhere else than in the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. I have never intimated that the Senator's services would be more useful elsewhere than in the Senate. Certainly he is getting into a bad temper if he thinks I intimated anything of that kind. We all know how valuable his services are here; but after he shall have gone through the arduous labors of the Senate, I hoped perhaps he might be able to give a month or two to the patriotic service of aiding the centennial exhibition.

Mr. SARGENT. I accept the Senator's apology.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no apology to make.

Mr. SARGENT. Then you need it.

Mr. SCOTT. If any is needed, it is needed in another direction for putting remarks into the mouth of a Senator which he has not uttered.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator's remark was entirely uncalled for by anything that I said, and I called his attention merely to the fact that such reflections upon a brother Senator are entirely unnecessary. When he says that my remarks would be better made to the commissioners, and as a member of the commission, I do not aspire to any such honor, and I do not wish to be remarked upon in that manner.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have had the honor of a seat on this floor for a little over four years, and I think this is the first time that ever any brother Senator has undertaken to put into my mouth words reflecting upon his conduct which I did not use. I did not say that the Senator's services would be more valuable elsewhere than they were here, which is the only thing that he has undertaken to say was of a personal character. I appeal to the Senate to say whether I made any such intimation against him or not; and I do not propose to be put in the position by that Senator or anybody else of forgetting my senatorial duty and saying what is not proper to a brother Senator. I leave that question with the Senator, and I do not wish to be diverted, by interpolating anything that has not been said in this debate, from what I do wish to say.

I have given the estimate made by these gentlemen, giving more of the items than I intended to at first, because it will be impossible for the Senate to wait and listen to an inventory of this kind. They follow that up by an estimate of the receipts which they expect they will receive. They exclude from those receipts the $1,500,000 which are expected to be used for erecting a permanent building. They estimate "receipts from admission fees, the lowest estimate made by men familiar with all exhibitions, on the basis of fifty cents admission, no season tickets, $2,000,000;" "subscriptions already made"—excluding, as I have already stated, those of the city and State—"$1,500,000; rents for restaurants and ground for proper private exhibitions, &c., $200,000; sale of buildings, $980,000; making, in all, $4,730,000." If an appropriation were made of $3,000,000, it would make the total receipts $7,730,000, and the extreme cost, according to this estimate, $8,125,000, which would leave to be raised still by popular subscriptions, $395,000. Now, upon the estimates that have been made for these buildings, and the proposals issued upon them, I am informed that responsible bids are already made for the main pavilion of thirty acres at $3,000,000, or half a million less than the estimate I have given.

I make this statement because the allegation has been made here that we may expect this exhibition to cost $20,000,000. I have no idea that any such expenditure as that will be incurred. I have no idea that these gentlemen dream for one moment of incurring any such expenditure; and, as I have already repeatedly said upon this floor, none of them object, indeed they rather invite, the co-operation of any officer that the Government shall think proper to appoint to participate with them in the control of these expenditures.

Now, sir, as I have risen again upon this question, (and I think, unless I am prompted to it by something which I hope will not occur during the discussion, it is the last time I shall rise upon it,) I wish to notice one or two positions that have been taken during the debate that I think my duty requires me to notice; and I do so, I wish to assure the Senator from California especially, without the slightest desire to reflect upon either the motives or the feelings of any person who has participated in this discussion. I now notice a statement which he made reflecting upon the governor of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to take up time in reading the statement, but the amount of it was that the governor ought not to have made the certificate which he did. But first I will refer to what he said of these subscriptions before I come down to the point in reference to the governor:

A large percentage of the subscriptions made for all such purposes never is collected. The obligation to pay them is imperfect, reposing rather in honor than otherwise; and the accidents of business prevent men from redeeming their promises of that kind frequently, and a panic has intervened which has crippled many.

I only wish to direct the Senator's attention to that quotation to show him that he is mistaken in it. This is not simply a voluntary subscription which the subscribers may meet in honor or otherwise, as they see proper. It is a subscription to a corporate stock, the corporation possessing the legal right to collect it. Therefore it is not that kind of subscription which depends simply upon the honor of the party making it. The observation is perfectly just that a panic has intervened, and there may be a few business men who have failed and may not be able to meet the liability; but the character of the large majority of all these subscriptions, so far as they have come under my observation, is such that I think very few of them will ever be in that class.

I now come to a point to which I ask attention for one moment:

But the only amount which there was a certainty they would get, a million and a half, was not pledged for suitable buildings for this exposition, and the governor of Pennsylvania knew the fact and ought not to have certified that there was provision made for such suitable buildings, if he has so certified.

There is a mistake again in the facts. It is true the amount is not appropriated for the purpose of putting up temporary buildings, but it is given for the purpose of a building expressly adapted to the purpose of this exhibition, set apart for its use, and to be used during the time that it shall be in operation. The Senator from California may not have been aware of all the facts relating to the manner in which the building was to be used. It is to be upon ground that has been conveyed to the centennial commissioners. They have absolute control of it. It is intended to be a part of the buildings prepared for this exhibition, and so far adapted to it that it has entered into the harmonious plan which they have adopted for the purpose of making it a successful business exposition. I do not suppose the Senator from California intended to convey the idea that this building might not in the end be used at all for this purpose, although that is the effect of the language he used. I only call his attention to it for the purpose of showing that the building is intended to be, and will be, a component part of the arrangement for this exhibition from the beginning to the end of it. His language was:

I mean to say just what I think, and I say the governor of Pennsylvania never should have so certified when the million and a half given by his State and city was not for the purpose of the exhibition or for suitable buildings, but was simply for a memorial hall, there to remain, and which might not be at all adapted to the purposes of the exhibition, and if it were is inadequate.

He throws a doubt by this language upon the question of whether it is to be used at all for this purpose. I simply wish to assure him, in all candor and in all kindness, that if he had that doubt, it is unfounded, for the reason that full arrangements have been made to have this building enter into and be a component part of the system of buildings used for this exhibition.

As to whether the governor ought to have certified or not, the Senator, of course, is entitled to his opinions upon the facts as they are before him. But what were the facts? One million and a half of dollars had been subscribed by citizens of the State; $500,000 had been given, not taken in corporate stock, by the city of Philadelphia; $250,000 appropriated directly out of the treasury of Pennsylvania, not made corporate stock, and $750,000 provided for to be raised by a tax upon certain street railroads in the city of Philadelphia; that million also to go in with the subscription of the city of Philadelphia and be used, as I have stated, in erecting this memorial hall, which was to be occupied during the whole exhibition and remain afterward.

I refer to this to show that the governor of Pennsylvania acted in good faith. This $3,000,000 which was considered to be secured was to be supplemented by what the finance commission believed at that time would be subscribed; and I know that on the 4th of July, 1873, at the time the buildings were transferred, that commission believed they had assurances from at least nineteen of the States that the moment they had their machinery ready to appeal to the people of those States the amount allotted to them would be taken in subscriptions to the corporate stock. With this amount secured, with the amount which they believed they would secure through this agency, who can say, especially in the light of these estimates, that it was not a provision for the erection of suitable buildings? If the buildings were to cost $4,900,000, and $3,000,000 were secured, would not the receipts of the exhibition and the materials, without considering the subscriptions that were expected to be received, be a reasonable assurance that there was no risk in proceeding then and securing suitable buildings? I feel more interested in this question because it may be considered a reflection upon the governor of Pennsylvania than because of its immediate bearing upon the aspect of the case now before us.

There was one other thing stated by the Senator from California, which perhaps he did not intend. When he spoke of the appropriation which is asked, after quoting the words of the bill, "to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in an international exposition to be held in Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States," he proceeded:

The corporation drops out entirely now. The $10,000,000 drop out. It is not under the auspices of a corporation in the city of Philadelphia. It is under nobody's auspices but the Government of the United States, and now for the first time it comes, and comes so strongly, that I said when I read the bill, and I said a few minutes ago, that if this bill passes, both as a Senator and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, having in charge the interests of the Government specially in that particular, I shall feel that my conscience is bound.

There certainly is language used here which would convey the idea that the "auspices of the Government of the United States" had never before been mentioned in this whole transaction, whereas the very bill which provided for this exhibition begins with saying that the exhibition is to be held "under the auspices of the United States." That no appropriation was contemplated is true. The disclaimer was in the bill, and nobody is here disputing the fact that it was so. All I am contending for is that nothing but good faith has been in this transaction from the beginning to the end; and it is because the machinery provided failed to raise the necessary money that these gentlemen come here now and place this matter as they do before the Congress of the United States.

The Senator went further, and I regretted that he did go so far as he did in saying that he would have preferred that this exhibition had been held either the year before or the year after 1876. That is to be a presidential year, and the Senator fears that our dirty linen will be washed before the eyes of Europe. Mr. President, I think I appreciate as fully as the Senator does those imperfections which come out upon the surface of republican institutions, but I do not think it is wise for us to animadvert particularly upon them. I think none of us need fear to submit our institutions as a whole—New York with its newsboys and newspapers, Philadelphia with its right angles and its beautiful homes, our broad prairies, the homes of labor, the school-houses, the churches, the intelligent people, the happy and contented laborers all over our land—in contrast with even the scenes which Dickens met on his first visit in the streets of New York and caricatured, as the Senator agrees he did, in the quotation he read to us. I do not think we need fear any of these contrasts with either the people or the institutions of Europe. Even if the peers of Parliament come here, I do not believe they will find us adjourning the Senate on an American Derby-day to go down to the horse-races; and while they may see in our presidential year many of the exaggerations, many of the falsehoods, which crowd into our political newspapers during that time, it is not through these characteristics mainly that we expect to speak to the people who come to the United States in 1876.

Mr. President, there are many imperfections in our institutions; there are many in all governments; but we do not expect either to make an unusual exhibition of our imperfections, nor to make an unseemly or immodest parade of what we believe to be the virtues of our Government. Some Senators seem to think that from the 19th of April to the 19th of October, 1876, there will be a continuous Fourth of July oration pouring out all the time, exalting the United States in disparagement of all other nations. Does anybody really entertain any such idea? There may be a Fourth of July oration; and, as I stated the other day, I would be glad to hear the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] make it; there may be several of them; but it is not through orations of that character that we expect to speak to these people; and if we do make any of them, I do not think we need apprehend a collision which will bring republicanism and monarchy to "bloody noses," which the Senator from California spoke of as being here metaphorically at that time. No, sir; we expect the products of art, of genius, of industry to be in that exhibition. We expect the products of the plow, the loom, the anvil, and our varied manufactures to be there. We expect the locomotive to be there in its beauty, for it is "a thing of beauty and a joy forever." We expect all the fabrics that the ingenuity of our workmen can put there. We expect those appliances and those inventions which have contributed as much to the alleviation of the toils and burdens of every-day life, to the advancement of the civilization of this age, as have all the finer fabrics and the fine arts of Europe to be there. We expect the models of our school-houses to be there, as they were in Austria. We expect our well-clad and well-fed laboring people to be there; and through all of these things silently we expect republican institutions to speak, not offensively to obtrude themselves upon those who come from other lands; and if they show the contrast to be favorable to us, they will say to them, "Come with us, and we will do you good." But if the contrast be unfavorable, we ourselves have invited it.

No, Mr. President, there is not any such view of exalting ourselves or of disparaging anybody else. These world's fairs, these international exhibitions have been great educators. They have contributed to the advancement of the race. They have cultivated kindly feelings between nations. They have been instruments for wiping out the asperities and removing the misunderstandings that have existed between men and nations; and I cannot think there is the slightest danger of the realization of those apprehensions which some gentlemen have of monarchical and republican institutions coming in conflict.

Why, sir, the author from whom the Senator from California quoted came among us once, and he saw our foibles and our vices, and he wrote the caricature which was read to us. But he came back again; he was with us a second time; and, if I recollect aright, he made us a graceful apology for the injustice he had done us, and wished to be counted our friend and admirer afterwards. It may be so with those who are now thinking that republican institutions are a failure.

I do not regret that the anniversary of 1776 comes in a presidential year, for that year will afford the people who come here the opportunity of studying the exaggerations, the dangers, the vices of our institutions, as well as their merits, and let them see them all together. Let us keep nothing back. When we go to Europe we expect to see the vices of those countries as well as their virtues. And even on the subject of our elections, I do not think we need very much fear. I remember being in the city of Cork in 1853, a little over twenty years ago, upon one occasion when there was a special election to fill a vacancy for a member of the British Parliament, and I think it would have done the woman's-rights people of this country good to have seen the women who surged around the open polling places of that election for a member of the British Parliament; and I do not think that ever in any place, even in the Five Points of the city of New York, an American election was held which would suffer in contrast with that election held in the United Kingdom.

Mr. President, I have been somewhat surprised at the various aspects this question has taken. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] first told us we must not have an international exhibition at all, but he is for a national exhibition. Many other Senators are for a national exhibition; but, strange as it may seem, even the Senator from Massachusetts wants a national exhibition, and is not willing that the Government of the United States should pay anything toward defraying the expenses of that national exhibition. Where are the expenses to come from?

Mr. SUMNER. May I remind my friend that I stand on the two acts of Congress by which the Government of the United States is expressly relieved from all liability on account of this business? I say, then, go on and have an exhibition—I think it ought to be national—but do not call upon the United States; just follow the law; that is all.

Mr. SCOTT. Then, I understand Massachusetts wishes to have a great national exhibition, but she does not want to pay one dollar of the expenses.

Mr. SUMNER. I will answer my friend. Massachusetts wishes that Pennsylvania on this occasion shall follow her own law, the law that was passed at her instigation, and which she accepted, and which between the United States and those corporators is in the nature of a compact. That is the simple desire of Massachusetts. Had Pennsylvania not interfered and undertaken this business herself I know not that we should not all have been ready to unite in some legislation by which the Government should assume this important duty; but we have been anticipated by Pennsylvania, or by Philadelphia, and they have accepted the terms, the conditions that the Government of the United States should never pay a dollar.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the prevailing idea will come out. Pennsylvania has "interfered" with somebody. "Interfered" is the word, and I suppose I understand the interference.

Mr. SUMNER. Did I say "interfered?"

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; the word was "interfered;" and now I trust the Senator will permit me to go on.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Pennsylvania came in and "interfered." We have had a resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts quoted in this debate; and that resolution has a history; and it had accompaniments; and we were told in a brilliant speech by a man whose name carries with it historical recollections, a prestige of ancestry, that this was not the way to celebrate the centennial anniversary of the 4th of July, 1776; not the way to have garnered in these buildings as a centennial celebration the products of the easel and of the chisel; not the way to have there the products of the loom, the plow, and the anvil. That was not the way. O, no; and even after invitations had been extended and after appropriations were being made, if paintings and sculpture were on their way boxed and ready to come, that would even have rivaled the productions of Phidias and Praxiteles, they are to be unpacked, sent back to the easel and the studio again, so that Boston, educated, enlightened, intelligent, æsthetic Boston, may luxuriate in the mental joy of fulfilling an apocryphal prophecy, and be made glad by hearing the clangor of horns and the sound of multitudinous drums and guns, and the exhibition of fire-crackers, and the smell of burnt powder, instead of an exhibition of the arts and industries of the nations. We have "interfered" with all this, and therefore it ought to be a national exposition and not an international exposition.

I am sorry we "interfered." It was not the intention of Pennsylvania to interfere with anybody. She wishes and hoped to make everybody happy. It was considered appropriate that this exhibition should be held at Philadelphia, and a gentleman who had his origin in New England introduced a bill in the House of Representatives announcing it as an international exhibition. It was so declared in the discussion that took place upon the bill; and now at this time we are met on one side by saying, "The international feature must be abandoned; it will be a failure—a failure after eight of the governments of the earth have accepted the invitation; a failure, because we cannot meet the expense;" on the other hand we are told, "Hold your national exhibition, and although the plan agreed upon has failed to raise money, let Pennsylvania go on; the United States will not give you a dollar."

Pennsylvania is not selfish in this matter. She has raised this amount of money, but she comes here saying, "If it is to come out of the Treasury, we will pay our share of the taxes to meet the appropriation." She will give the money she has subscribed, and pay her share of the taxes too. And although I am not willing to stand here and make pledges for anybody, I feel satisfied that, if this appropriation is made, another $1,000,000 of the stock of this exhibition will be taken in the city of Philadelphia, because then its success will be assured.

It has not been an "interference;" it has not been a local celebration; and there has not been any desire to make it such. The very argument read by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] in which he quoted my remarks, was intended to show that it ought not to be treated as a local celebration; and that if this corporation were to be made a local one, that argument might be made.

Mr. President, the view of Philadelphia, the view of Pennsylvania, on this whole subject has been broad, has been catholic, has embraced not simply the nation, but humanity throughout the world. She has sought to bring here men of all climes and creeds; and of all other obstacles she never expected to find the Senator from Massachusetts standing in her way. This morning, as showing the current of the Senator's thoughts, when he was referring to the remarks I made on this subject, he spoke of "the Senator from Philadelphia," although I do not happen to live in that beautiful and patriotic city. Philadelphia is brought forward prominently as the scape-goat to carry off the sins, if there be sins, connected with the preliminary preparations for this centennial exhibition.

Mr. President, once for all, for Philadelphia, for Pennsylvania, we wash our hands of all selfishness. We wish it to be understood that we want to do what is right about this centennial exhibition. We wish to cultivate fraternal feeling with the people of all the States, with the people of all nations who will come; and in order that we may know upon what scale that is to be done, to what extent we shall go, we ask the Senate, before this bill is sent to the Committee on Appropriations, to determine what character this exhibition shall have, national or international; that once determined, I shall make no objection to referring this bill to the Committee on Appropriations, that they may make such appropriation as they may deem proper, as they think ought to be made, after its character shall have been settled.

Mr. President, I ought, perhaps, to apologize for having asked the attention of the Senate as long as I have done on this subject; but I have felt it a duty for the reason that, however unjustly, the Senate considers this business as belonging to Pennsylvania and Philadelphia, and, however feebly I may be able to do it, I cannot hear the reputation, the fair fame, or the good faith of either the State or her capital city assailed, even by implication, without attempting to vindicate their honor and their good name.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, it is to be regretted, in all measures of this kind, where an appropriation is asked which is not provided for by any existing law, that the feelings of a Senator should be warmly interested in the success of the proposition. Whenever that is so, a new, and I might almost say a foreign, element is cast into the discussion. It is so difficult for us upon this floor to disregard the strong wishes of a fellow-Senator, that sometimes we are embarrassed in the pursuit of that which would otherwise be a very plain duty. I have felt this all the way through in the consideration of this bill, and I feel it at this moment. I know that the Senator who has just taken his seat has very strong feelings upon this matter, so much so that sometimes, in the heat of debate, he goes further than he himself thinks in ascribing motives to other Senators, or in deprecating their antagonism of his measure; or, in other words, making it uncomfortable for them to give full expression to the opinions which they have on the subject. I have felt that embarrassment somewhat, and perhaps other Senators have felt it. I have no doubt that during the last Congress Senator Trumbull may have felt it in some degree when he rose to speak on a constitutional question, and was informed by the Senator, in the natural zeal with which he surrounded the subject in his mind, that probably he was only speaking to exhaust time until Senators could arrive, for really he could not oppose the bill.

When the Senator gave us the cost of the shell of a building, and I informed him that there must be furniture in that enormous building, probably carpets for the offices of the building, that there must be fountains, that there must be accessories to make it graceful and beautiful, which would cost a great deal of money, instead of giving any weight to the suggestion, I was informed that it was a great pity I could not be on that board to inform them of these things, with which I seemed to be so familiar. Perhaps I took quick and unreasonable offense at a suggestion of that kind, thinking my place was here as a Senator of the United States to guard the United States Treasury, and if there was to be a draft upon it, to ascertain even by an attention to details, of which I did not assume to be better informed than the Senator himself, how great that draft would be. That is all I desire to say on that matter.

But a more important consideration, which I rose to suggest, is that I was not in error yesterday when I criticised, as I then said, boldly, the act of the governor of Pennsylvania upon the insufficient premises which were before him, in certifying to the President of the United States that proper provision had been made for buildings for this exposition. It is shown even by the statement read by the Senator from Pennsylvania this morning that four or five millions are necessary for this purpose, and it is not pretended there was at the very outset, taking the million from the State and the half million from the city of Philadelphia, and the million and a half of perhaps good subscriptions, all together, suitable provision for the buildings of this exposition, and we are not informed now what the material is to be. It may be mere wood-work, with a few windows here and there. We have no statement that it is to be a crystal palace, such as was erected in New York some years ago, such as was erected in London, in Paris, and in Vienna, or anything commensurate to the purpose, even at the cost of $4,000,000.

I do not wish to reflect upon Governor Hartranft, for I was satisfied, in the discussions that took place over his name during the election at which he was chosen the governor of Pennsylvania, that he was unjustly aspersed, that he was really an excellent man, worthy to be the governor of the State of Pennsylvania, and I have no doubt that such is his character, and I have no desire to detract from his merits or to insist that he has willfully done an improper act; but I do say that he has not exercised sufficient circumspection in performing that deliberate act which we laid upon his conscience by our statutes to perform carefully and circumspectly, in certifying to the President of the United States, as the basis for this invitation to the nations of the earth, that suitable provision had been made for these buildings. He certainly, better than any one else, knew just what the statute of Pennsylvania was which tied up a million and a half of this money, and showed that it was not for the general purposes of the exhibition; for I find at the end of it:

Approved the 27th day of March, A. D. 1873.

J. F. HARTRANFT

If any gentleman in Pennsylvania, or anywhere else, would know officially of this statute, it was the gentleman who gave it vitality by his signature.

Now I invite the attention of the Senate to the peculiarities of this statute. I did not do it yesterday; in fact I was not then aware of some of the provisions which were contained in it; but every line of the statute goes to strengthen the deductions which I made yesterday and the conclusion at which I arrived, and which I urged upon the attention of the Senate. I will read this statute, although it is lengthy, and I call attention to some peculiar propositions that are in it which are admonitions to ourselves. The first section provides:

That the sum of $1,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the erection of a permanent centennial exposition building for the people of this Commonwealth—and for the use of the centennial anniversary of American independence, under the direction of the United States centennial board of finance, incorporated by act of Congress, to be paid, however, only as hereinafter provided.

Not for the people of the United States, but for the people of the Commonwealth—a local matter—

It will be observed this is a perpetual building, not to be taken down and sold with the other property of the association, to cover any deficiency which may exist when their affairs are being wound up, therein justifying the remark which I made yesterday that this was not to be part of the assets of the corporation, but simply a local building.

No larger sum than shall be received into the State treasury on account of the centennial anniversary fund hereinafter provided shall be paid by the State treasurer on account of the permanent centennial exposition building during the present year, and not exceeding $300,000 shall be paid of the amount hereby appropriated during the year A. D. 1874, and not more than $300,000 for the year A. D. 1875; and the residue of $1,000,000 shall be paid on or before the 4th day of July, 1876: Provided—

And here is a very peculiar provision; and I want to see the section of the constitution of Pennsylvania wherein it differs from the Constitution of the United States—

That the moneys herein appropriated are in no event to be drawn from or out of the revenue of the Commonwealth, which, under the constitution and laws of the State, are set apart for payment of the State debt.

Under the Constitution and laws of the United States are not the funds which we raise set apart for the payment of the United States debt?

Mr. SCOTT. That is a local affair, which I will explain. The canals and railroads of the Commonwealth were sold many years ago, and there are bonds in the treasury of the State called the sinking fund for the payment of the State debt, and it is to that matter that that exception refers. It would not be understood, of course, by those not conversant with the history of the State.

Mr. SARGENT. At any rate we are informed by the constitution and laws of that State. The laws, of course, are liable to be repealed by any subsequent law. So far as any stress is placed on the word "law," it is obvious, as every lawyer will understand, that no stress can be placed on an act of the Legislature which any subsequent Legislature or that one may repeal. So far as the constitution of the State prohibited an appropriation for it, so far it would cripple the Legislature of that State from contributing to the success of this exposition, and that must have been in contemplation, or rather known to the gentlemen who procured the original measures under the statement that the local authorities, if necessary, would pay all these expenses.

And if, from any cause, the revenue especially provided as a centennial anniversary fund by the fifth section of this act shall be insufficient to provide the whole moneys hereinbefore appropriated, no more money than the sum of $250,000 shall be paid from the State treasury to the purposes aforesaid.

If they could pay one-fourth of the amount out of the State treasury "to the purposes aforesaid," if this special revenue were not collected, why could they not pay a million out of the State treasury for the purposes aforesaid? That clause is an answer to the remark the Senator made just now, if I understand it. Certainly if one-fourth of the amount can be paid in defiance of the constitution and laws of the State, the whole amount could be paid in defiance of the constitution and laws.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator misapprehends it. There is a constitutional provision which places in the treasury the bonds of which I spoke, and sets them apart for the payment of the State debt. The provision of the law he is reading is that no part of this money shall be paid out of that sinking fund.

Mr. SARGENT. I call the attention of the Senator to the words—

That the moneys herein appropriated are in no event to be drawn from or out of the revenue of the Commonwealth.

It does not refer merely to canal funds.

Mr. SCOTT. Read what follows.

Mr. SARGENT. "Which under the constitution and laws of the State are set apart for payment of the State debt."

Mr. SCOTT. Exactly; and the constitution does set apart those bonds specifically for the payment of the State debt, and they cannot be used for any other purpose.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator unquestionably is correct; but admitting that, still the argument fails, for if from the other revenues of the State, which are not set apart for the payment of the State debt, $250,000 can be appropriated, certainly $1,000,000 can be appropriated, and there ought not to be this illiberal provision that only $250,000 shall be expended even for their own perpetual building. But let us pass to section 2:

Before any part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid, satisfactory evidence shall be furnished by the State centennial supervisors, hereinafter named, that at least $1,000,000 of bona fide, responsible private subscriptions shall have been made within the city of Philadelphia to the capital stock of the said United States centennial board of finance, which shall be officially certified to the governor by the said supervisors, and a sum not less than $500,000 shall have been appropriated by the municipal authorities of the city of Philadelphia, to be applied to the erection of the permanent centennial exposition building hereinafter provided for.

So that any appropriation at all from the State treasury or from this special fund was conditional upon there being $1,000,000 of bona fide subscriptions by citizens of Philadelphia; and I have remarked all that I desire to upon the goodness or worthlessness of the whole or any part of subscriptions of that character. It is very true that these subscriptions are the subscriptions to the stock of a corporation, and corporations have, under the laws of every State, the power to enforce the payment of their subscriptions; but that takes no account of failures, of removals, and of a great many other things, and we certainly have had a panic which has shaken the credit and the abilities of very many men, not only in the city of New York, the great center, but also in the city of Philadelphia and the other large cities. But at any rate the Legislature, treating this as a new proposition, would not allow one dollar to go out of their treasury, either to a special or general fund, unless on this condition-precedent, not themselves assuming that the citizens of Philadelphia would do these things, assuming that it was necessary to protect themselves and compel them to do them.

And now let me ask, if this is a national and general exposition, why should the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania be required to appropriate by private subscriptions this $1,000,000 if there was no special local benefit from it, if people were not to be drawn from all parts of the country to Philadelphia to patronize hotels, to employ the street railroads, to make purchases there? Why should the Legislature of Pennsylvania require this million to be subscribed by the people of Philadelphia? It was because it was expected to be of local benefit, by calling people from all the States of the Union to assemble during a large number of months in the city of Philadelphia; and therefore it is that it is, as recognized by this statute, in so great a degree a local measure and pressed so strongly by the Senators who represent that locality.

But they further provided that not only should the people of Philadelphia subscribe $1,000,000 to the stock of the corporation, and not less than $500,000 be appropriated by the city authorities for the erection of the permanent building before spoken of, but further—

And a contract shall have been executed by the said centennial board of finance, and the centennial board of finance incorporated by the act of Congress, with the State centennial supervisors hereinafter named, the commissioners of Fairmount Park, and the representatives of the city of Philadelphia, as the authorities of said city shall appoint for the purpose, stipulating that a permanent fire-proof building shall be erected in Fairmount Park as part of the centennial exposition buildings, to cost not less than $1,500,000, which building shall remain in Fairmount Park perpetually as the property of the people of this Commonwealth for the preservation and exhibition of national and State relics and works of art, industry, mechanism, and products of the soil, mines, &c., of this State.

In passing the statute they required, not carelessly and loosely, as did the Congress of the United States, that somebody not under our jurisdiction should certify to a certain state of facts, but they required that a contract should be actually made, approved by these parties, for the erection of a building which should be fire-proof, describing it, and that it should cost not less than $1,500,000, and there to remain permanently for the exclusive use and benefit of the State of Pennsylvania and city of Philadelphia. We did nothing of the kind, and consequently we are brought face to face with the proposition we are now discussing, and that is, that, confiding to the governor of Pennsylvania the duty of certifying that suitable provisions were made, he did not follow the form of the statute he himself signed in his own State, but certified on the faith of some rambling subscriptions and on a restricted appropriation by his own State and its chief city. And all this is to be—

Under such regulations as the Fairmount Park commissioners, the State centennial supervisors, and the proper representatives of the city of Philadelphia shall from time to time prescribe.

The whole of it seems to be withdrawn from the purview of this corporation which we have created, and which is to spend the money of the United States and private subscriptions.

But in passing from that let us go further. In section 3 they name the State centennial supervisors:

Alexander Henry, J. Gillingham Fell, and John O. James, of the city of Philadelphia, William M. Lyon and John H. Shoenberger, of the county of Allegheny; George R. Messersmith, of Franklin County; William Bigler, of the county of Clearfield; Ario Pardee, sr., of the county of Luzerne; and John H. Ewing, of the county of Washington, be, and they are hereby, appointed State centennial supervisors—

They did not have confidence in this corporation, whose responsibility and whose head have been so much praised on this floor; they appointed their own centennial supervisors—who shall, in addition to the powers and duties hereinbefore prescribed, formally approve the design, plans, and specifications for said permanent centennial exposition building, and report the same with their approval, to the governor—

Where comes in our board of finance, where come in our regulations of the size or accommodations of this building, of the uses to which it shall be put?

and they shall formally approve any contract or contracts for the erection of said building and for materials for the same—

The same want of confidence in the authorities which at the suggestion of those interested in this exposition we have created—and also report such contract or contracts, with their approval.

To whom? To the corporation or its officers? To Mr. HAWLEY, its president? Not at all, but "to the governor" of the State.

And no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid until such design, plans, specifications, and contract or contracts shall have been officially approved by said supervisors and so certified to and approved by the governor. When said supervisors shall certify to the governor that the labor done and materials furnished for said building amount to the sum of $100,000, the governor shall draw his warrant on the State treasurer in favor of the treasurer of the centennial board of finance for $50,000.

There is the first time they appear. They are not to judge of the materials; they are not to approve the plans; they are to have no supervision; they are to be held off at arms-length; but when $100,000 of work has been done to the satisfaction of other people, then $50,000 is put into their hands for payments; they are made messengers to carry the money or take the receipt, for that is all it amounts to. There is the confidence which is evinced by the Pennsylvania Legislature in this scheme and the management of it, which Congress has been led into sanctioning.

And thereafter whenever the said supervisors shall certify to the governor that the additional work done and materials furnished amount to the sum of $100,000, and that the money previously paid has been fully and properly applied—

Observe the limitation, when "the money previously paid" and put into the hand of our board of finance has been properly applied, has not been stolen by them or somebedy else—he shall draw his warrant in like manner for $50,000, if so much shall remain unpaid, in accordance with the stipulation for the annual payments contained in the first section of this act; and when said supervisors shall certify that said centennial exposition building is complete, that the full sum of $1,500,000 has been expended on the same, and that the previous payments have been fully and properly applied, the residue of $1,000,000 shall be paid, as hereinbefore directed; but no larger amount shall be paid during any one year than is provided in the first section of this act.

Is not every line of this statute a commentary of the opinion of the Legislature of Pennsylvania on the competency of this machinery—this corporation which we have set at work? Not a dollar will they let them handle unless by driblets, when it shall first have been shown to the satisfaction of the local supervisors of the State of Pennsylvania and of the governor that twice the amount of work has been done, and that the amount previously paid has been properly applied. And yet you ask Congress now to go forward and put three millions in the hands of this corporation. That is the most modest proposition that comes here. Some say, and probably with truth, that it will need five or eight, or perhaps even twenty million dollars. We are to put this money in the hands of this corporation when the Legislature of Pennsylvania will not put $50,000 into its hands! It seems to me that to ask that of us is absurd.

But how are they going to raise this fund in Pennsylvania? They are not going to take it out of the general revenue of the treasury, though it was not tied up by the constitution of the State; for they provide in section 5—

That in order to provide revenue to enable the State to meet the appropriation hereinbefore made, on or before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1873, all street passenger railway companies now incorporated in the city of Philadelphia shall make return to the State treasurer, under oath of the proper officers, stating the gross receipts of each of said companies, from the passage of this act until said return is made, and like quarterly returns shall be made by said companies thereafter until the 1st day of April A. D. 1877, inclusive; and with each report there shall be paid by said street passenger railway companies to the State treasurer 3 per cent. of such gross receipts, which revenue shall be placed by the State treasurer to the credit of the centennial anniversary fund; and all moneys paid by said State treasurer, on account of the appropriations hereinbefore made, shall be paid out of the said centennial anniversary fund until the same is exhausted, and the residue, if any, required to be paid during any one year, shall be paid out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

I am told—I do not know whether the information is correct or not—that the street railway companies are raising constitutional questions; that they are resisting the authority of the State to levy this special tax upon them and upon their industry; that they are going to take the case into court; and if it goes into court it may take years before it is decided; that it is now litigated, or about to be litigated; and I myself must confess that I can see reasons why they might well resist the payment of a tax of this character. And if that is so, then $1,000,000 more of this appropriation falls out; and I should like to ask on what foundation the governor of Pennsylvania certified that there had been suitable provision made for building for this exposition? This statute of that State proceeds:

On the 1st day of April, A. D. 1877, the tax upon the gross receipts of said railroad companies shall cease and determine. Any of said street passenger railway companies which shall, within thirty days after the passage of this act, file with the State treasurer an official acceptance of its provisions, shall thereupon, each and every of them, be released from any penalty or penalties to which they or any of them might be liable under any proceeding in law or equity for any violation of the provisions of their charters, respectively, prior to the passage of this act—

That seems to be sugaring the pill which they are to take if it is nauseous. All the bad things you have done heretofore, all the violations of your charters, shall be condoned and pardoned—and the faith of the State is hereby pledged to such accepting companies that the legal rate of fares said companies are now authorized to collect shall not be reduced by legislative enactment before the 1st day of April, A. D. 1877. Any street passenger railway companies incorporated after the passage of this act shall also report their gross receipts and pay the tax on the same from and after they commence to carry passengers, as hereinbefore provided.

Approved the 27th day of March, A. D. 1873.

J. F. HARTRANFT.

If the State of Pennsylvania, with the same magnanimous spirit, had levied a tax of 3 per cent. upon the gross receipts of the hotelkeepers in the city of Philadelphia, it certainly would have covered the case precisely; it would have provided by the most effective means in its power that all the money which should be expended for the purpose of the centennial exhibition on behalf of the State should be drawn from the visitors to the city, or the largest proportion possible. For who would patronize the street cars? Not the local residents who have their carriages and other modes of conveyance, to a certain extent. Unquestionably they would patronize the street cars to some extent, but the strangers universally moving about the city, having none of these local conveniences, would have been their principal customers. If they had only added to that a tax on the receipts of the hotels, then the measure would have been complete; it would have had a symmetry which certainly would have excited the admiration of any one who examined this financial system.

Now, sir, in view of this statute and the knowledge of the governor of it, and the fact that the buildings provided by the State and by the city were not for the ordinary and usual or general purposes of the exposition, but were for a side-show merely, for an art gallery; that it was not designed that those buildings like the other buildings of the corporation should be part of its assets and liable to pay its debts; that there was a failure, or at any rate not at that time a realization, of the expected subscriptions from other places; that the whole thing rested in theory except that which depended upon State law, and that that was so badly tied up that it did not answer the spirit of the legislation of Congress—in view of all this the governor, at least, allow me to say, was hasty in certifying that suitable provision had been made. And now, sir, we are confronted with the fact, in the light of the experience which has taken place since that certificate was made, that he did certify too hastily; that suitable provision had not been made at that time, and has not been made down to the present time. That I say, without any desire to bear hardly upon that gentleman; without knowing him; and I have no wish at all to detract from his reputation, but simply impeaching his judgment in this matter; and if it be said that he exercised good judgment, then I am driven to the other horn of the dilemma, and I am compelled to give reasons why he violated good faith; that I prefer not to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THURMAN in the chair.) The motion is to refer this bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 3, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of last evening, which is the bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] from the Committee on the Public Lands, the bill (H. R. No. 1760) to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read.

It provides in its first section that sections 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, of the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," approved September 4, 1841, and the acts amendatory thereof; the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof; and the act entitled "An act for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida," approved June 21, 1866, be, and the same are thereby, repealed; provided, that the act shall not be construed as repealing the act entitled "An act to amend an act relating to soldiers' and sailors' homesteads," approved June 8, 1872, nor the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," approved March 3, 1873, and any amendments to said acts.

The second section provides that any settler, in person, on the unappropriated public lands of the United States, not pine lands, mineral, coal, or saline, who is the head of a family, or a single person over the age of twenty-one years, and is a citizen of the United States, or who shall have declared his intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, shall be entitled to enter the lands covered by such settlement, not to exceed one quarter-section, or one hundred and sixty acres, or a less quantity of unappropriated public lands, held at the minimum price of $1.25 per acre, or eighty acres or less of such unappropriated lands, held at $2.50 per acre, to be located in a body, in conformity to the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed.

The third section provides that when the settlement is made on unsurveyed lands such settler shall, within four months from the receipt of the township plat of survey, at the district land office, make application to the register of the proper land office for the land embraced in his or her settlement; and where the settlement is upon surveyed lands, said application shall be made within four months from date of settlement; and the party shall make affidavit that he or she is the head of a family, or is a single person over twenty-one years of age; and that he or she has made actual settlement on the land, and that said application is made for his or her exclusive use and benefit, and for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and not, either directly or indirectly, for the use or benefit of any other person or persons whomsoever; and that he or she has not heretofore claimed the benefit of the homestead laws upon the unappropriated public lands of the United States, or, having made such claim, has been unable to perfect the same through no default on his or her part; and that, to the best of his or her knowledge and belief, there is no person residing on the land entitled to enter the same as a homestead; and, upon filing such affidavit with the register or receiver, and on payment of ten dollars, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land specified; provided, however, that no certificate shall be given or patent issued therefor until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, or at any time within two years thereafter, the person making such entry, or, if he be dead, his widow, or in case of her death his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry her heirs or devisee in case of her death, shall prove, by two credible witnesses, that he, she, or they have resided upon and cultivated the same for the term of five years immediately succeeding the date of entry, and shall make affidavit that no part of said land has been alienated, then, in such case, he, she, or they, if at that time a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent as therein provided by law; and it is further provided, that in case of the death of both father and mother, leaving an infant child or children under twenty-one years of age, the right, under the certificate or fee under the patent, shall inure to the benefit of said infant child or children, to the exclusion of any other person or heirs, and the executor, administrator, or guardian may, at any time within two years after the death of the surviving parent, and in accordance with the laws of the State in which such children for the time being have their domicile, sell said land for the benefit of said infants, but for no other purpose, and the purchaser shall acquire the absolute title by the purchase, and be entitled to a patent from the United States, on payment of the office-fees and the sum of ten dollars herein specified, or the said minor heirs may, with the consent of their guardian, continue the settlement and cultivation of the land for the unexpired term of five years, and make proof of the same, as in other cases, provided that if said heirs are not then of age, the proof may be filed by their guradian; and further provided, that where a settler may die before making an entry under this act, leaving a widow, then said widow shall be entitled to the benefits of his settlement, and allowed to make the entry of the tract in her own name, and receive a patent for the land, upon compliance with the other requirements of this act.

The fourth section provides that when two or more qualified persons shall have settled on the same quarter-section of land, the right of entry shall be in him or her who made the first settlement; and all questions as to the right of entry arising between different settlers shall be settled by the register and the receiver of the district within which the land is situated, subject to revision by and appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose decision shall be final, unless appeal therefrom be taken to the Secretary of the Interior; provided, however, that all contests based on alleged prior settlements shall be initiated within four months from the date of entry of either of the claimants; and that all appeals, whether from the decision of the district land officers or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, shall be made within two months from the date of the receipt by the appellant of notice of the decision in the case.

The fifth section provides that any person owning and residing on land at the date of this act may enter, under the provisions of the act, other unappropriated public lands of the United States, not pine lands, mineral, coal, or saline, and adjoining his or her land, and which shall not in the aggregate exceed, together with the land so already owned and occupied, one hundred and sixty acres of minimum, or a proportionate quantity of double minimum land; provided that the person so entering land for an adjoining farm shall not be required to reside upon the same, but shall in good faith use and improve the same for the purposes of an adjoining farm.

The sixth section provides that whenever the vacancy of the office, either of register or receiver, or of both, shall render it impossible for the claimant to comply with any requirement of this act within the appointed time, such vacancy shall not operate to the detriment of the party claiming, in respect to any matter essential to the establishment of his claim; provided that such requirement is complied with within the same period after the vacancy is filled as would have been allowed him had such vacancy not existed.

The seventh section provides that no lands acquired under the provisions of the act shall be liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of the final certificate therefor.

The eighth section provides that if at any time after entry, and before the expiration of the five years aforesaid, it shall be proved, after due notice to the settler, personally if practicable, or by publication in one newspaper for four weeks in the county where such land may lie, and if no newspaper be published in such county, then by such publication in a newspaper in the county where the proper district land office is located, to the satisfaction of the register and the receiver of the land office and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the person making such entry shall have actually changed his or her residence, or abandoned the said land for more than six months at any time, then and in that event said settler shall be considered as having forfeited his claim to said land, and his entry shall be canceled, and the land shall revert to the Government, and shall be disposed of as other public lands.

The ninth section provides that when it shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that any person making an entry under the act shall have abandoned such entry and his wife and family, and the said wife has continued the settlement and improvement of the land according to the provisions of the act, then and in that event she shall be entitled to make the proof of such settlement, and to receive patent for the land in her own name.

The tenth section provides that no person shall make more than one entry on the public lands under the provisions of the act; provided that no person shall be debarred from the privileges of the act by reason of having theretofore had the benefit of the pre-emption laws of the United States; but no person who has made an entry, and consummated or abandoned the same under the homestead laws, shall be entitled to the privileges of the act, unless such abandonment shall have been made for reasons filed in writing, under oath, with the register of the district land office and approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; provided further, that all persons who may have at the passage of the act valid pre-emption claims shall be allowed to perfect the same, and acquire title under the provisions of the pre-emption laws in force prior to the passage of the act.

The eleventh section provides that the fifth section of the act entitled "An act in addition to an act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1857, shall extend to all oaths, affirmations, and affidavits required or authorized by this act.

The twelfth section provides that where, by reason of distance, bodily infirmity, or other good cause, the applicant is prevented from personal attendance at the district land office, it shall and may be lawful for such applicant to make the affidavit required herein before any person legally authorized to administer oaths, and to transmit the same with his application, and the proper fee and commissions, to the register and the receiver; provided that the register or receiver of the district land office may, at his option, visit in person the county in which any of such lands are located, and take the proofs required as above; and for such proofs in each case taken by such officer at places other than at the district land office, in addition to the fees above provided for, he shall be entitled to receive the sum of three dollars as a personal fee for such extra services.

The thirteenth section provides that beside the ten dollars' fee exacted by this act, the homestead applicant shall pay to the register and the receiver each, as commissions at the time of entry, 1 per cent. upon the cash price as fixed by law, of the land applied for, and a like commission when the claim is finally established and the certificate therefor issued as a basis of a patent; and the register and the receiver shall be allowed, jointly, at the rate of ten cents per one hundred words for the testimony which may be taken and reduced to writing by them for claimants in proving their claims; provided that the salary and fees allowed any register or receiver, under this and other acts, shall not exceed, in the aggregate, the sum of $3,000 per annum; and all fees received in excess of this sum shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The fourteenth section provides that any settler who shall make entry under this act may perfect the same before the expiration of the five years, and obtain a patent for the land upon making proof of settlement and cultivation for not less than eighteen months from date of entry, and paying for the land at the price it was held by the Government at the date of original entry; said payment may be made with cash, military land-warrants, or agricultural-college scrip, in the same manner as has heretofore been authorized in payment of pre-emption claims.

The fifteenth section provides that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is thereby authorized and required to prepare and issue such rules and regulations consistent with the act as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect.

The sixteenth section provides that if upon survey of any tract of land, or upon release of any reservation, and restoration of the land embraced therein to entry under the provisions of the act, two or more settlers shall be found on the same quarter-section, each shall be admitted to enter his or her improvements as near as may be by legal subdivisions, to include the residence of the applicant; provided, however, that if two or more persons shall be found in such case to reside on the same smallest subdivision, then joint entry by the parties shall be allowed by purchase of such subdivision for cash only.

The seventeenth section provides that any person above the age of twenty-one years, and who is a citizen of the United States, or who may have declared his intention to become such, shall be entitled to enter, by purchase with cash only, a tract of land not exceeding forty acres, as a site for mechanical, commercial, or manufacturing purposes, upon proof satisfactory to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that he is in the actual possession of such premises, and that no valid adverse claim existed at the date of his occupancy, and has occupied and held possession of the same for such purposes, for his own use and benefit, for a period of not less than one year; provided that notice of his intention to claim said tract shall be filed with the register within two months from the date of actual possession, and that the payment therein required shall be made within eighteen months of such filing.

The eighteenth section provides that all lands within the lateral limits of any railroad grant, the title to which shall remain in the United States, whether an odd or even section, shall, upon becoming subject to sale or to the provisions of this act, be held at the double minimum price of $2.50 per acre, unless otherwise specially provided by law.

The nineteenth section provides that in all cases of entries of the public lands of the United States made under the homestead law and its amendments, where it shall appear that the parties have substantially complied with the requirements of said law, but have failed to get upon the land within six months from the date of entry, or have otherwise failed in the minor requirements of the law, such failure shall not be construed to work a forfeiture, but the entry shall be subject to the equitable consideration of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who may, if he is satisfied that the entry was made in good faith, and that the failure of the settler was not from his own neglect, approve the case, and issue patent in the usual manner; provided that such entries have not heretofore been canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The twentieth and last section provides that the act shall take effect from and after the 1st day of September, 1874.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not propose to occupy the attention of the House at any length this morning, because I know that gentlemen are very desirous of having the morning hour for reports of committees. I have, therefore, only to say that this bill is the result of the experience of the Land Office, the experience of the gentlemen connected with the land States and Territories, and the experience of all who have had anything to do with the public lands. It abolishes the old pre-emption laws which were the prolific source of a large amount of frauds and perjuries, so much so that the public lands of the United States under that pre-emption law were gradually accumulating in the hands of a few speculators to the exclusion of the men who desire to go and settle upon the public lands and make homesteads thereon. Those frauds and perjuries have been of the most cool and unblushing character. And since this Congress has been in session there has come to my knowledge a case wherein something like six thousand acres of the public land of the nation have got into the hands of a few speculators by the most atrocious frauds and the most villainous perjury. Men who never were upon the land have sworn to making entry; men who never were in the neighborhood have been accepted as witnesses; and the improvements that were sworn to in claims that were filed in the land office have never been made at all. Yet all the proofs were clear, such as the land office could not disregard; and under those atrocious and fraudulent operations patents have been issued for over six thousand acres of the public lands.

It is in order, then, to prevent such frauds and perjury, and that the public lands that are arable and that may be homesteaded may be put into the hands of the people who wish to settle upon them, that they shall not come into the hands of speculators, that this bill has been drawn. It has been very carefully drawn. It has been examined by the Commissioner of the Land Office. It has been carefully examined by the Committee on the Public Lands, who reported it unanimously, and has been submitted to men who are acquainted with the operations of the public-land system throughout the Western States.

As it has been before the House now for more than a month, I do not desire to occupy any more of the time of the House, further than to say that the Committee on the Public Lands have instructed me to report three or four amendments to the bill, and after that to ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The first amendment I have to offer is in section 2, line 2, to strike out the words "pine lands."

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In section 2, line 2, strike out the words "pine lands," so that it will read:
That any settler, in person, on the unappropriated public lands of the United States, not mineral, coal, or saline, &c.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman explain the reason for this amendment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The reason why the words "pine lands" are stricken out is this: That although there might be some pine lands in the Northern States that would not be used for homesteads, yet in the Southern States the pine lands are homesteaded, and are found to be good and available lands for homesteading and for agriculture.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The committee also instruct me to move to amend on page 6, section 5, line 4, by striking out the words "pine lands," so that it will read:

That any person owning and residing on land at the date of this act may enter, under the provisions of this act, other unappropriated public lands of the United States, not mineral, coal, or saline, and adjoining his or her land, and which shall not in the aggregate exceed, together with the land so already owned and occupied, one hundred and sixty acres of minimum, or a proportionate quantity of double minimum land, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On page 8, section 10, line 7, I move to insert before the words "homestead laws" the words "pre-emption or." Also, in the same section, line 13, I move to insert between the word "pre-emption" and the word "claims" the words "or homestead." Also, in line 14, I move to insert after the word "pre-emption" the words "or homestead." Also, in line 15, of the same section, I move to insert after the word "force" the word "immediately."

The amendments were severally agreed to; and the section as amended reads as follows:

SEC. 10. That no person shall make more than one entry on the public lands under the provisions of this act: Provided, That no person shall be debarred from the privileges of this act by reason of having heretofore had the benefit of the pre-emption laws of the United States; but no person who has made an entry, and consummated or abandoned the same under the pre-emption or homestead laws, shall be entitled to the privileges of this act, unless such abandonment shall have been made for reasons filed in writing, under oath, with the register of the district land office and approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided further, That all persons who may have at the passage of this act valid pre-emption or homestead claims shall be allowed to perfect the same, and acquire title under the provisions of the pre-emption or homestead laws in force immediately prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Those are all the amendments the committee have instructed me to offer.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to ask him a question for my own information, and it is this: Is this substantially the same bill that was passed by the House in the closing hours of the last Congress?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is substantially the same bill with the amendments and improvements that have been suggested to the committee by the General Land Office from its experience since that time.

Mr. BECK. The next inquiry I wish to make is whether, in the repeal of the old pre-emption laws, any provision is made to dispense altogether with the requirement of the iron-clad oath?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The bill does not require any oath at all. There is no oath of any kind or character in the law except the oaths necessary to make the proper proof.

Mr. BECK. I suggest to the gentleman this amendment, which he can insert wherever he pleases:

Provided, That no oath other than an oath to support the Constitution of the United States shall be required from any person in order to entitle him to the benefit of this act.

When this bill, or one substantially like it, was before the last Congress in its closing hours, I introduced an amendment, which was accepted by the committee, and was to this effect:

That no oath or affirmation other than an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States shall hereafter be required to be taken by any person claiming the benefit of this act or any act of which this is amendatory.

I introduced that amendment, which was adopted by the House, for this reason: that since the close of the war, up to the present day, no man from all the South who directly or indirectly, by reason of his residence or anything else, had given any aid or comfort to the rebellion, could ever pre-empt a foot of the public lands of the country; and that law stands to-day. Men may come from all parts of the earth, civilized or uncivilized, and the moment they declare their intention to become citizens of the United States they can pre-empt the lands of the United States, but as against nine States and eleven millions of people of the United States all the lands of the United States have been hermetically sealed, because they have been unable to take this iron-clad oath. That law applied to homesteads as well as pre-emptions until by an act of 1868, the title of which was to provide for swamp-lands in Louisiana and Alabama, the iron-clad oath was dispensed with. That law did not repeal the former acts, but the Commissioner of the Land Office, with commendable liberality, construed that act, which upon its face applied only to lands in Louisiana and Alabama, to apply to all the homesteads of the United States; and from that time to this he has not required that oath from homestead settlers. But, sir, the withholding of its requirement is a matter of grace by a liberal construction from a liberal officer of the department, and not by law. This amendment cannot possibly do any harm; and in order to avoid the possibility of a change of construction, let us say directly that lands shall be open to all men, and that no iron-clad oath shall be required. We adopted the amendment before, and I think we ought to adopt it now. It can do no harm.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not see the least necessity for the amendment, because this bill provides for all of the oaths and proofs that are necessary. But if the gentleman will feel easier to have that amendment ingrafted upon the bill, I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. BECK. I can see none.

Mr. HEREFORD. I would suggest to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to modify his amendment so as to provide that no oath touching loyalty or disloyalty shall be required.

Mr. BECK. I am willing it shall be in any form so as to exclude the idea of requiring the iron-clad oath.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would suggest also that the amendment be modified so as to include the cases where entries have already been made. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has suggested that the practice heretofore followed in regard to homestead entries of not requiring the iron-clad oath is a mere matter of construction by the Commissioner of the Land Office. If so, then there may be a doubt whether the law has been complied with. Let the amendment be so modified as to validate all cases where entries have heretofore been made.

Mr. BECK. I know we put the amendment in the bill of the last session for safety.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am willing that the amendment should be offered. Let it be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That no oath other than an oath to support the Constitution of the United States shall be required from any person in order to entitle him or her to the benefits of this act, except those prescribed in this act.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask that there be added to the amendment these words: "nor shall any entry heretofore made be invalidated for want of any other oath."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman indicate where the amendment shall come in?

Mr. BECK. Let it come in where the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] who has charge of the bill may say it should come in.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let it come in at the end of the third section, immediately after the provision in relation to proofs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will hear it read.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to move to amend by adding to section 4 the following:

Provided, That the proof required under this section may be taken before a judge of a court of record, or a clerk thereof, in the county in which such land is situated, and when so taken shall be submitted to the register and receiver of the land office, and shall have the same effect as if taken before those officers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I cannot admit that amendment, because it is provided for in section 12.

Mr. PAGE. That section provides for affidavits only; it does not provide for proofs.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is the same thing.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It refers to final proofs also.

Mr. PAGE. It refers only to ex parte affidavits.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think any such amendment is necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a suggestion in regard to the scope and effect of this bill. From a hasty reading of it, itwould seem—and that seems to have been the effect also of the bill before the House at the last session—that the purpose is to provide a virtual repeal of all laws authorizing any disposition of the public lands, except as contemplated by this act.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No, sir; it expressly excepts the soldiers' and sailors' homesteads; it does not interfere with the sale of public lands by proclamation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman to let his bill go a little farther, to provide that all laws authorizing the sale of public lands subject to homestead provisions, except as authorized by this act, shall be repealed. If the gentleman will do that, I think he will be instrumental in the enactment of the most enlightened and humane law which ever passed a Congress. Of course the location of the bounty-land warrants is inevitable; and, as a matter of course, every one desires that the homestead laws for the benefit of soldiers and sailors shall be perpetuated. But in addition to that, and for the purpose of giving permanent effect to the homestead law, in order to make it apply to all public lands capable of cultivation, it seems to me that we should take this enlightened step forward, and provide that no part of the public lands subject to the homestead provision of this act shall be open to sale. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania would strike the public heart with more force and meet with more universal approval if he should insert a provision withdrawing all public lands from sale and speculation, than by any other act of legislation that can be devised.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] if he has not a very distinct recollection that during the last Congress I brought in from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill doing that very thing; and that the previous question was seconded, and then a motion to reconsider was made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] which put the bill over so that it could not pass?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman's recollection is substantially correct. But it was then a contest between the soldiers' bounty act and the act providing the withdrawing of the public lands from sale. And as between those two measures, I favored the one for the benefit of the soldiers.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. A further question at this point. Does not this bill accomplish, substantially, the same thing, as long as the Government does not advertise any of the public lands for sale?

Mr. HOLMAN. But cannot the Government advertise the lands for sale?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It has not done so for many years.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman from Illinois know (for he has had large experience in this matter) that the object most desirable in our legislation with reference to the public lands is to stop speculation in those lands? The lands of this nation are not legitimate subjects of speculation; they should be held for the sole purpose of securing homes to actual settlers. Any law that does not seek this object fails to meet the great want of our legislation in respect to the public lands.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman and I entirely agree in the view that all our public lands ought to be disposed of under the homestead law. During the last session I brought in such a bill as I have indicated. When the Senate bill, almost exactly like this, came over, upon my motion it was passed by the House, and would have become a law but for the fact that the gentleman from Kentucky proposed an amendment substantially similar to that now presented, which was adopted by the House; and the bill, going to the Senate in the expiring hours of the session for concurrence in the amendment, failed.

The Senate has agreed to this bill; and it accomplishes substantially what the gentleman from Indiana and I so much desire. I hope, therefore, he will not antagonize the bill by insisting on his amendment. I know the difficulty of securing legislation on this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded to me, and I cannot allow the gentleman from Illinois to take up my time. The gentleman from Illinois certainly knows that as long back as five years ago the sentiment of the House was in favor of repealing all laws which permitted speculation in the public lands. For five years at least the universal sentiment of the country has been against such speculation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. We are all aware of the fact that the evil which, under the homestead law, we designed effectually to stop, was speculation in the public lands—the securing to homesteaders alone of every acre adapted to cultivation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from Pennsylvania will allow my amendment to be offered, so that it may be voted upon by the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not propose to admit the amendment, for the reason that all the arable public lands of the United States will be taken up under the homestead act; but there are some lands—barren lands, not worth probably ten cents an acre—which the Government will never get rid of except by doing what has been done heretofore—by putting them up for sale after a proclamation by the President. But the present bill is abundantly sufficient to give to every man in the country a home.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Can any of these lands be disposed of otherwise than under the homestead law, unless by advertisement? In other words, if this bill be passed would not the lands be disposed of under the homestead law unless they were advertised? Because by this bill we repeal the pre-emption law; and the policy of the Government has been for many years not to advertise lands for sale.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield three minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] after which I must call for a vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have another amendment here which I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will allow me to submit. I think he will not object to it when he hears it. It proposes to provide:

All lands heretofore granted to any railroad or other corporation, by any act of Congress, or to any State, for the construction of railroads, and which have been or shall be forfeited by a failure of such corporation or State to conform to the provisions or conditions of the grant, are hereby subjected to entry under the provisions of this act.

Mr. DUNNELL. While the chairman of the committee is considering that amendment, I wish to call attention to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1871. There had been an increasing friction between the practical operation of the pre-emption law and the homestead law, and it was early seen that the two systems could not work in harmony for any very great length of time. Six or eight years ago the Commissioner of the General Land Office called the attention of Congress to the fact that sooner or later the pre-emption laws of the country must be repealed. In the report of that officer submitted in October, 1871, I find on page 62 a clear and succinct statement of the objections to the separate existence of the two systems, and a recommendation that they be consolidated. I ask the Clerk to read a part of this report as setting forth in a few words the argument in favor of this bill, which is substantially if not exactly the same as one which was passed by this House in the last session.

The Clerk read as follows:

The great ends to be secured by this proposed consolidation of the homestead and pre-emption laws are the following:

1. The harmonious adjustment of conflicting claims under the operation of this office, thereby giving a consistency and uniformity to its administration not otherwise attainable.

2. The prevention of irreconcilable conflicts between different settlers; one claiming under the pre-emption law, based upon alleged priority; the other presenting a claim equally equitable under the homestead act, which does not recognize such priority.

3. The total discontinuance of the pernicious practice of speculators who flock along the great lines of projected railroads, and into other sections of country giving promise of favorable development, and by merely filing declaratory statements upon the public lands, prevent their acquisition by bona fide settlers and secure and hold claims for purposes of illegal sale. This practice has compelled honest pioneers to purchase the fraudulent claims of such illegal pre-emptors or incur expensive litigation to secure title; it has harassed and vexed those who in good faith made actual settlements, and delayed and prevented the disposal of the public lands; it has caused an excessive and unprofitable expenditure of the labor and money of the Government, as well as of the settlers, in proceedings to adjudicate the questions thus forced upon them.

4. The certainty of a speedy settlement of conflicting interests by the simplicity of the action required to establish priorities, and other proofs of compliance with law.

5. An additional revenue to the Government from the fees required in the inception of a claim by formal entry which actually appropriates the land, and which offers a greater incentive to its final consummation by patent, than a mere informal filing made without appreciable cost, and held as lightly as it is easily initiated.

6. The clearing from the Government records of a vast accumulation of filings, many of which are purely fictitious, never intended in good faith, but are merely the designations of the claims of speculators, and thus stand to the prejudice of bona fide claimants.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing I could possibly add to the very strong argument which has just been read from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana to offer his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following, to come in as a new section preceding the last section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

All lands heretofore granted to any railroad or other corporation by any act of Congress, or to any State, for the construction of railroads, and which have been or shall be forfeited by a failure of such corporation or State to conform to the provisions or conditions of the grant, are hereby subjected to entry under the provisions of this act.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield now to the gentleman from California for three minutes.

Mr. PAGE. I desire the Clerk to read the fourth section, with my amendment, in order that the House may clearly understand it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That when two or more qualified persons shall have settled on the same quarter-section of land, the right of entry shall be in him or her who made the first settlement; and all questions as to the right of entry arising between different settlers shall be settled by the register and the receiver of the district within which the land is situated, subject to revision by and appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose decision shall be final, unless appeal therefrom be taken to the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That all contests based on alleged prior settlements shall be initiated within four months from the date of entry of either of the claimants, and that all appeals, whether from the decision of the district land officers or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, shall be made within two months from the date of the receipt by the appellant of notice of the decision in the case: Provided further, That all proofs required under this section may be taken before a judge of a court of record, or a clerk thereof, in the county in which such land is situated, and when so taken shall be submitted to the register and receiver of the land office, and shall have the same effect as if taken before those officers.

Mr. PAGE. Now, Mr. Speaker, my object in offering that amendment is simply this: In California, and in a large number of the Western and Southern States, we do not have the same easy mode of traveling about which they have in Pennsylvania and in the other Eastern and Middle States. Therefore it would subject the people in California and in the Western and Southern States to great annoyance and expense in being compelled to travel, in some instances, from fifty to one hundred and fifty miles to the register or receiver of the land office of the district where they may reside. This law will allow the proof to be made, in those cases where there shall arise a question as to the right of the party to settlement upon the lands, before a judge or clerk of the court of record in the county where the land may be situated. In the land district where I reside such an expense would amount, under the provisions of this bill, to from fifty to one hundred and fifty dollars.

The design of this measure is to afford an easy acquisition of homesteads by the people, not only of the great West but of the whole country, and such being the object, I trust the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands will not object to the amendment I have moved to the fourth section, because, as I have stated, it will cost in most instances in my district, where they have to travel by their own conveyance, and at great expense to themselves, from fifty to a hundred and fifty dollars, to go to Sacramento.

Mr. DUNNELL. This amendment ought not to be accepted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I decline to admit the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman from California intend his amendment to apply in the future, or to affect cases in the past and which are now in controversy?

Mr. PAGE. I propose that my amendment shall apply only to the future, with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Section 12 provides for the case where the applicant is prevented from personal attendance at the district land office, making it lawful for the applicant to make the required affidavit before any person having authority to administer oaths. The provisions of that section are a complete answer to the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. LOWE. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. LOWE.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 8:

And no grant of land to any railroad company, or to any State for the use of any railroad company, shall be deemed or held to attach, or to have heretofore attached, to any land while a subsisting entry exists under this act or the homestead act of 1862, but such land shall be deemed to be appropriated and withdrawn from other disposition until an actual reversion of the same to the Government takes place by the proof of an actual change of residence or abandonment by the claimant, as herein provided, or as provided in the homestead act of 1862.

Mr. LOWE. Now I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give me five minutes to explain the effect of that amendment. I offer it in the interest of one thousand homesteaders, who are liable to lose their lands by the contradictory rulings of the Land Office.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I cannot yield further, and call the previous question.

Mr. BARBER. I hope the gentleman will yield to me to offer an amendment which is necessary, and which I think will not be objected to.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands will not urge this bill at present. It is a very important measure.

Mr. BLAND. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] I will say that the people interested in these homesteads in the West have to pay in many instances from fifty to a hundred dollars to go to the district land office to make proofs, and they are demanding everywhere the right to make the proof in the county where the land is situated; and no bill that does not incorporate that provision will meet their approval. Such a provision will prevent frauds, because a man cannot appear in the county where he resides with witnesses who will commit perjury, while he can do so at the land office.

The register in the district where I reside undertook to go around the various counties in the district that this proof might be made where the witnesses resided; and he writes me that when proof was made in that way frauds could not be committed; that it was only when he went back to the district land office that the parties appeared and made fraudulent proofs. He writes me, further, that the Land Office here prohibits him from going into the interior counties and permitting the parties to make proofs there before him.

I say there is no man in the West but will sustain such a provision, and for one I will oppose the bill until that provision is incorporated with the bill. It does not contain it now. It merely contains the provision that where, from bodily infirmity, &c., an applicant is prevented from attending the district land office, he may make the proof before any person legally authorized to administer oaths; but it does not provide that this may be done in all cases, as it ought to do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that section 12, it seems to me, is ample to cover every case where a man is properly prevented from appearing personally at the district land office to make his final proof. It provides for the cases where he is prevented "by reason of distance, bodily infirmity, or other good cause."

Mr. BLAND. It should be admitted that there is "good cause" in all cases that the applicant should be allowed to make his proof in the county where the land is situated, instead of having to go to the district land office.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to say a word on this amendment. I have as much sympathy for the settler as any man on this floor, and urged the amendment to be found in section 12 of the bill, that in certain cases, where there was good cause for it, the applicants should be allowed to make proof before some person legally authorized to administer oaths, instead of having to go to the district land office. But surely gentlemen cannot see how dangerous it would be to permit men to make their final proofs before a clerk of the court. That clerk of the court has not a single record of the land office in his possession; he may know nothing at all about the kind or character of the proofs; the applicants may go before that court and make proof that would be absolutely defective, and when received at the land office it might be too late to make a revision. Under no circumstances, Mr. Speaker, should there be a proof allowed outside of the land office. The records should be there, the applicants should be there, the certificates should be there, and the law should be there.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not wish to be stopped in the short argument I am making on this point. I yield to the gentleman, however, for a question.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does not the law already allow the initiative, the preliminary affidavit, to be made before any officer authorized to administer oaths in the county which is the residence of the applicant?

Mr. DUNNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALDWELL. If that be so, why should not the final proof be made in the same way?

Mr. DUNNELL. In reply to the gentleman's question, I would ask him if the initiatory oath is not a wholly different thing from the final proof in all its essential characteristics? The applicant's title rests upon the character of his final proof. If the applicant wants to get a good title to the land he has been on and cultivated for five years, let him make his final proof where he is certain to get the best kind of title. But if he takes it before the county clerks of courts there will be opened a source of fraud. The passage of this law is intended to dry up the frauds that have been practiced under the old system; and not for a moment should we consent to the amendment which has been proposed. It is against the interest of the settler.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Is not this proof, when taken at the office of the register and receiver, taken by a clerk and submitted to him?

Mr. DUNNELL. No; not that I know of.

Mr. PAGE. In nine cases out of ten the register and receiver are not present when the proof is taken, but it is simply examined by them after it has been taken down by a clerk.

Mr. DUNNELL. But the plats are there, and all the papers of the office.

Mr. PAGE. What plats do you want in determining a question as to which party first settled upon certain land? It is simply a question of fact, to be tried by the clerk of a court of record.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the House, if it is friendly to the passage of this bill, will not admit this amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CALDWELL.]

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand the object of allowing parties to make the preliminary oath in the county of their residence was to enable those who from bodily infirmity were unable to reach the land office to make it; and, sir, if the object of the law was in the interest of parties who are entitled to homesteads, I can see no reason why the final affidavit should not also be made in the county of the residence of the party making it. It is in the interest of those persons who, under the law, are allowed to enter these homesteads. Many of these parties, as the House has already been informed, living in the South and in the West, are required to travel from fifty to one hundred miles to appear before an officer in order to make the affidavit. What sound reason is there why those parties should not be allowed to make these affidavits at home, where they are known and where the lands are known? It seems to me that this of itself would be a protection to the Government, and prevent all frauds.

I will add further that there are many parties in the South and in the West who have taken the preliminary steps to secure to themselves and their families homesteads, who would not be able to meet the expense of traveling one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles, and paying hotel bills, to appear at the land office. I think the amendment of the gentleman from California is meet and proper; and I hope the House will not sustain the previous question, but will allow an opportunity for amendments. We have already legislated in regard to the initiatory oath, and the parties should be allowed to make the final oath in the same manner.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE.]

Mr. CROUNSE. I represent a State which is perhaps as much interested as any other State in this question, and I venture to say that the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] will meet the hearty approbation of the settlers in that State. Anything which tends to obviate the expense which now attends the taking of proof in these cases, will, I say, commend itself to our people; and I apprehend that if there is any difficulty about the matter, we can easily so frame this bill as to guard entirely against any abuse of the privilege. The privilege of taking the proof in this way will relieve the settler of the great expense which must attend his going, in many districts, from one to two hundred miles to take the proof, and in contested cases taking his witnesses with him. The amendment of the gentleman from California will tend to obviate the embarrassment caused in this way.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. I move to amend section 3, line 28, by inserting after the word "widow," the words, "if she be the mother of his children and if she be not the mother of his children then she and his children jointly;" so that it will read:

Provided, however, That no certificate shall be given or patent issued therefor until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, or at any time within two years thereafter, the person making such entry, or if he be dead his widow, if she be the mother of his children, and if she be not the mother of his children then she and his children jointly, or in case of her death his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry her heirs or devisee in case of her death, shall prove, by two credible witnesses, that he, she, or they have resided upon and cultivated the same for the term of five years immediately succeeding the date of entry, and shall make affidavit that no part of said land has been alienated, then, in such case, he, she, or they, if at that time a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent as herein provided by law, and so forth.

The object of the amendment is to meet this state of things: If the person making the entry dies, leaving a widow of a second marriage, with no children by that marriage, yet having children by a former marriage, we now allow the widow to take the property, to the exclusion of the children.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The hour has expired, and the question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House does not second the previous question, will my amendment then be in order?

The SPEAKER. The House yesterday directed that this bill should be considered as operating under the previous question after one hour's debate. The Chair has sent for the Journal.

Mr. PAGE. What is the motion now?

The SPEAKER. There is no motion, except that the bill be engrossed and read a third time prior to its passage.

Mr. LOWE. Is a motion in order to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BLAND. I hope this bill will not be passed until we have had some opportunity of amending it.

Mr. LOWE. I hope the bill will not be passed in its present shape. There are several amendments that ought to be made to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the Journal of yesterday's proceedings on this subject to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. TOWNSEND, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That the bill of the House No. 1760, to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain, heretofore committed to Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, be considered in the House to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the previous question to be considered as seconded and the main question ordered after one hour's debate.

Mr. PAGE. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order pending the operation of the previous question. The only action of the House in regard to this bill, to dispose of it, is either to pass it or reject it.

Mr. CESSNA. Cannot the gentleman reach his purpose by waiting until the bill has been read a third time, and then moving to recommit it with instructions to make the amendment indicated by him?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] will then be entitled to the floor to test the sense of the House upon the previous question on the passage of the bill. If that be not seconded, then a motion to recommit, either with or without instructions, would be in order.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and upon a division there were—ayes 64, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. PAGE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 90, noes 66.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Upon that I call the previous question.

Mr. LOWE. I desire to move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order. Should the previous question not be seconded by the House, then the motion will be in order.

Tellers were ordered upon seconding the previous question; and Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. PAGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 81, noes 67.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being but 16 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of the last vote.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. PAGE. Will it be in order for me, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to move my amendment on this bill?

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I object.

Mr. PAGE. Then I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were, upon a division—ayes 24, noes 102; not one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. SHERWOOD called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but 15 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF CONTAGIOUS AND INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BROMBERG. I desire to give notice that on Monday next I shall move to suspend the rules in order that the House may take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1584) to prevent the importation of contagious and infectious diseases into the United States, for consideration after the Louisville and Portland Canal bill shall have been disposed of. In this connection I call the attention of members to House Executive Document No. 85 of this Congress, to Senate Executive Document No. 9, third session Forty-second Congress, circulars Nos. 1 and 5 War Department, on epidemic cholera, a report on epidemic cholera and yellow fever in the United States Army during 1867, and the report of the supervising surgeon of marine hospitals in 1873.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the House on yesterday gave permission to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to send for persons and papers, and to employ a clerk and stenographer, in reference to the western judicial district of Arkansas. As that whole matter must come before the Committee on the Judiciary, I do not think it necessary for two committees to be allowed to send for persons and papers in relation to the same subject.

Mr. SPEER. Did the gentleman vote on the prevailing side?

The SPEAKER. There was no record made of the vote, the yeas and nays not having been called.

Mr. SPEER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, for the reason that there is other business before the House.

Mr. SPEER. I think the RECORD will show that the resolution was adopted on yesterday without opposition.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But there was no motion to reconsider and lay on the table.

Mr. SPEER. But the resolution was agreed to by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. That does not prevent a reconsideration.

Mr. SHERWOOD. When a resolution is adopted under a suspension of the rules can a motion to reconsider be made?

The SPEAKER. It cannot.

Mr. KILLINGER. What is the resolution referred to?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the House did, on the 16th day of February, direct the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to inquire into the expenses, disbursements, and general management of the western district of Arkansas since its organization in 1871; and whereas said committee in pursuing its inquiries under the aforesaid resolution of the House doth require for said investigation additional powers and facilities to those already conferred upon it: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said committee have authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a clerk and stenographer for such period as it may deem proper.

Mr. BECK. What is the business pending before the House to prevent a motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] is entitled to the floor from half-past one for the consideration of the bill under his charge. The ordinary usage of the House is this: When a subject has passed from the consideration of the House, on the succeeding day any gentleman can enter a motion to reconsider. That is a privileged motion, but not of sufficiently high privilege to deprive the gentleman from Iowa of the right he has to the floor by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. SPEER. A resolution having been adopted by the House yesterday under a suspension of the rules——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken; it was not adopted under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. SPEER. I think that motion was made by the gentleman who offered the resolution, and the Chair stated that it was adopted without opposition.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair differs from that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] was upon the floor with a motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole. Pending that motion considerable business was done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPEER. I myself offered a resolution under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent.

Mr. SENER. What is the object of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] in making this motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] yield further?

Mr. MCCRARY. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] provided his proposition takes no time.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The Committee on Printing have directed me to report, with a recommendation that it pass, a resolution relative to printing Professor Hayden's final report on the Cretaceous Flora of the West.

Mr. SPEER. Before the question raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] passes from the House, I desire to know whether my motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider is pending.

The SPEAKER. It is not; but the gentleman can make that motion whenever the motion to reconsider is called up. If the gentleman from Massachusetts does not call it up within a reasonable period, it will be the right of any other member of the House to call it up. No member, by making a motion to reconsider, can suspend a subject indefinitely. Within a reasonable time he is entitled by courtesy to be recognized for the purpose of calling up the motion; but if he does not avail himself of his right within a reasonable time, any other member can call up the motion.

Mr. SPEER. What would the Chair construe as a reasonable time?

The SPEAKER. Probably the Chair would not differ with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] on that point. The Chair would allow the gentleman first to suggest what should be regarded as a reasonable time. [Laughter.]

While this subject of reconsideration is up, the Chair will remind the House of two important points. The rules provide that on the day when a measure passes, or on the succeeding day, it shall be in order to enter a motion to reconsider, to be taken up as privileged at a subsequent time. Within the time allowed for the making of the motion, the gentleman making it is at liberty to withdraw it; but if the time within which a motion to reconsider can be entered is allowed to pass, the gentleman who has entered such a motion cannot thereafter withdraw it, because to allow him to do so would deprive every other member of the right to enter the motion. Nor can a gentleman, by entering a motion to reconsider, keep a question suspended beyond a period which the Speaker, under his responsibility to the House, would regard as a reasonable time for the settlement of the question.

Mr. SENER. Is it in order to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House at the present time.

Mr. BECK. As the Speaker is aware, I know very little about the rules, I am sorry to say; hence I ask whether the entering of this motion to reconsider by the gentleman from Massachusetts gives him the right to be heard upon the question for one hour when he shall call up the motion?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will relieve my friend from Kentucky. I do not intend to occupy an hour.

Mr. BECK. It is the question of right that I am inquiring about.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly the gentleman would have that right under the rules.

Mr. BECK. I want to say that it has been my endeavor constantly to have motions to reconsider laid on the table, so that propositions like this should not be brought back on a motion to reconsider. I missed the opportunity in this particular case, I presume.

The SPEAKER. It is very seldom the gentleman from Kentucky misses the opportunity. He did it, however, in this instance.

Mr. SPEER. Under the present ruling of the Chair, would it have been in order yesterday for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] to move to reconsider and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

The SPEAKER. Certainly it would have been clearly in order; and it was the impression of the Chair that it had been done; but neither the RECORD nor the Journal shows such to have been the fact; and by that authority we are all bound.

Mr. SENER. I will state, in my own vindication, that I was about to make the motion to reconsider and lay on the table when the gentleman from Pennsylvania sitting next to me said that, the proposition being adopted under a suspension of the rules on Monday, the motion to reconsider and lay on the table did not lie; and five minutes afterward I heard another gentleman on the floor making that motion; and the Chair distinctly stated that when a proposition was adopted under a suspension of the rules no such motion was in order.

The SPEAKER. That is the fact; but when a proposition is adopted by unanimous consent the case is different.

Mr. SENER. I did not hear unanimous consent asked. I thought the resolution was adopted under a suspension of the rules. Of course my impression differs from that of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The impression of the Chair, however, is fortified by the Journal and the RECORD, which, unfortunately, do not fortify the impression of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SENER. That is true.

CRETACEOUS FLORA OF THE WEST.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the resolution reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound twenty-five hundred copies in quarto (uniform with the series) of Professor Hayden's report on the Cretaceous Flora of the West—one thousand copies for the Department of the Interior, one thousand copies for the Smithsonian Institution, and five hundred copies for the office of the United States Geological Survey of the Territories.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. HALE, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSIDERATION OF REFERENCES.

Mr. RANDALL. The Journal shows that a number of propositions, in addition to that of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER,] were adopted yesterday by unanimous consent, and that the motion to reconsider has not been laid on the table. I move, therefore, that in reference to all other matters done yesterday by unanimous consent, the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

FUR-BEARING ANIMALS IN ALASKA.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce for consideration now, the bill (H. R. No. 225) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," approved July 1, 1870.

The bill, which was read, provides that the act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," approved July 1, 1870, is thereby amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to designate the months in which fur-seals may be taken for their skins on the islands of Saint Paul and Saint George, in Alaska, and in the waters adjacent thereto, and the number to be taken on or about each island.

Mr. MAYNARD. How does that come in?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to have it brought in.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce unanimously to report it to the House and to put it on its passage.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it offered by the gentleman on his individual motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, from the Committee on Commerce, asks unanimous consent to be allowed to report this for consideration now.

Mr. MAYNARD. I understood the gentleman from Michigan to say that this bill has had the examination and approval of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. It has; and if the House will allow me, I will make a brief explanation.

The SPEAKER. The right of objection will be suspended while the gentleman is making his remarks.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a single remark in reference to this bill. It was prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, and sent to the Committee on Commerce by the House. It provides that the Secretary, in his discretion, may determine the number of seals which may be killed on each of the islands of Saint Paul and Saint George, and the time when they may be killed. The Government receives a revenue of $261,000 a year as royalty for the killing of fur-seals on these islands, and it is all done under the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. One hundred thousand seals are permitted to be killed annually. By the law it is provided three-quarters of that number may be killed on the island of Saint Paul, and the remaining one-quarter on the smaller island of Saint George. In the then state of knowledge of these islands it was thought that was the proper proportion. A Government agent was sent nearly two years ago to examine the number and the habits of the fur-seals on each island; and that agent, Mr. William H. Elliot, has made an exhaustive report on the whole subject, which has been printed. From that report it appears only about one-twentieth or one-thirtieth of the seals inhabit Saint George Island. The proportion therefore allowed by the law to be taken from the smaller island is manifestly too large. The number, too, varies on that island from year to year.

The necessity for this legislation is that there is but one steamer leaving San Francisco, authorized by the Government, to go to these islands. A very good steamer leaves San Francisco in the spring, about the 1st of April, and then in the fall to bring down the skins which have been taken. The Secretary of the Treasury desires this action of the House that he may send instructions to the Government agent by the steamer leaving in April, and in order to do that this bill must pass the House and become a law at once.

The bill makes no change in the law in regard to the number of fur-seals which may be killed, but merely authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to determine and to so instruct the agent of the Government what number may be killed respectively on each of these islands. It also enables him to determine the time when these fur-seals may be killed. The time is now fixed for four months in the year. It is found it should commence earlier, about the middle of May, as the fur-seals arrive at that time. It would give longer for the taking of fur-seals, and thus prevent their being scared away from the islands.

The committee are of the opinion the bill is a proper one to be passed.

Mr. POTTER. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will amend the bill so as to provide it shall not be lawful to take and kill fur-seals on these islands at any other time than in the months designated.

Mr. CONGER. The law is so now. We extended the first portion of the time fifteen days. The time was originally fixed by the Russian calendar, and, of course, according to the old style, and we have thus accidentally, by adopting that calendar, left out eleven days which ought to have been included.

Mr. KELLOGG. Why should not we fix the time in this bill as it should be, and not leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. McCRARY. Unless this bill can be disposed of without further discussion, I must insist on going on with the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. There is no other time in which these animals may be killed. Those interested in taking the skins of these fur-seals would not kill them at times when they are shedding their fur or when their fur has not acquired proper consistency.

Mr. KELLOGG. Why not fix the time in the bill?

Mr. CONGER. It is already fixed in the law, and we only add fifteen days to that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the bill being taken up for consideration?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. When does the morning hour begin?

The SPEAKER. There is no morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. Unless the gentleman from Iowa yields absolutely or goes on with the regular order, I must object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report an appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The House proceeds to the consideration of the special order, which is the bill (H. R. No. 1385) reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals to regulate commerce by railroads in the several States. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCRARY. If agreeable to the House, the first reading of the bill may be omitted. But if any gentleman desires that it shall now be read, I have no objection myself.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with. The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCRARY. Mr. Speaker, I desire, at the very outset of this debate, to call the attention of the House particularly to the bill itself, so that its purpose and scope may be clearly understood, and that the issue which we are to discuss and decide may not be misapprehended.

I need not say to the House that it is now settled beyond controversy that a railroad is a public highway, and that a railroad company is a common carrier. These propositions have been settled by the decisions of the highest courts of the States and also by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States itself.

The pending bill relates exclusively to interstate commerce. It asserts the right and the duty of Congress to regulate such commerce as is carried on among the several States by means of railroads. It provides two things in the nature of regulations. These are, first, that persons engaged in this commerce shall be prohibited from making unreasonable or extortionate charges; and, secondly, that they shall be prohibited from unjust discrimination in the matter of charges. The bill, Mr. Speaker, is therefore simply declaratory of the common law itself.

I desire to say here and now that this bill has not been prepared and reported to the House in any spirit of hostility to railroads or to railroad men. It requires of persons engaged in this commerce nothing which any fair-minded man can say is not fair and just and reasonable. It requires of them only that which the common law, as it has stood from time immemorial and as it stands to-day, and as it is administered in all the courts of the land, requires of them.

My first duty is to make clear to the House this proposition. I say that, according to common law, a common carrier is bound to carry for all persons who may apply to him, without unjust discrimination, and for a reasonable compensation; and that the common law, like this bill, prohibits both unreasonable charges and unjust discrimination.

This doctrine of the common law was announced by the Court of King's Bench in England as early as 1703, by a no less distinguished judge than Lord Chief Justice Holt himself, who, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Coggs vs. Bernard, reported in 2 Lord Raymond's Reports, says that the common carrier "exercises a public employment."

Later than that, in the same court, the doctrine was laid down in more emphatic language, at a time when Lord Mansfield was a member of the bench. In the case of Harris vs. Packwood, which is reported in 3 Taunton, and which was decided, I believe, in 1810, the decision of the court, as announced by Lawrence, J., has these words:

> I would not, however, have it understood that carriers are at liberty by law to charge whatever they please. A carrier is bound by law to carry everything which is brought to him, for a reasonable sum to be paid for the same carriage, and not to extort what he will.

The doctrine of the common law on this subject is summed up by Judge Redfield, who is, as I presume every gentleman here will concede, the very highest authority in this country upon the general subject of railroads and the laws which govern them. In an article published in the American Law Register for January, 1874, occur these words, and I call the attention of the House to them, because they contain in a single sentence the law upon this subject—the common law, as I contend, has existed from time immemorial.

It is the duty, he says, of common carriers "to carry for all who apply, for reasonable compensation; and to make no unreasonable or unjust discrimination among those who desire to employ them." And he cites a long list of authorities, which any gentleman may examine if he chooses, and which will leave no doubt whatever as to the soundness of the proposition.

The same author, in a work published some years ago—Redfield on Carriers and Bailments, announces the same doctrine, in these words:

> Carriers of goods and passengers, who set themselves before the public as ready to carry for all who apply, become a kind of public officers, and owe to the public a general duty, independent of any contract in the particular case.

The supreme court of Massachusetts, in the case of the Fitchburgh Railway Company vs. Gage, which is reported in 12 Gray's Reports, 398, quoted and indorsed the language which I have quoted from 3 Taunton.

So, Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt of the proposition I lay down, that these common carriers, like all other common carriers, are bound by the common law to do the very things which this bill requires that they shall do. I may be asked, then, if the common law supplies a remedy, which covers the whole ground, why we need any legislation. But, Mr. Speaker, every gentleman will see, upon a moment's reflection, that although the right which the common law gives is the same which it is proposed to give by this bill, yet that the remedy which the common law affords is entirely inadequate. It is true, sir, that whoever believes he has been wronged and injured by extortionate charges, or by unjust discrimination, may bring his action at common law against the railroad company which has injured him. But every lawyer knows that the only remedy that he can get is his actual damages. No individual can afford to engage in a litigation with a railroad company in such a case, for the reason that the sum to be recovered will, in every case, prove to be much less than the costs and expenses of the suit. The purpose of the bill, then, is, in a word, to enforce the rights which the people have under the common law, against these great corporations which are engaged in this commerce, by suitable and sufficient penalties. Gentlemen will see by examining the bill what those penalties are. I have not time now to go into details.

Taking it, then, as a clear proposition, that the duty which this bill requires of these carriers is reasonable and just, and is precisely what the common law itself requires, I proceed now to discuss the other questions which arise upon this bill, and they are these: Has Congress power to regulate commerce among the several States, as carried on by means of railroads? If so, may that power be exercised by providing against extortionate and unreasonable charges and against unjust discriminations, leaving the courts and juries, as the common law does, to decide what is and what is not a reasonable charge, and what is and what is not an unjust discrimination? And, if the power exists, and if it extends thus far, is it expedient for Congress to exercise it?

As to the question whether Congress has the power under the Constitution to regulate such commerce as is carried on by means of railroads among the several States, I shall have occasion to do litfle beyond merely quoting from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, because this is no longer, Mr. Speaker, an open question. That Congress has this power, and that it is exclusively in Congress, is now settled. I do not say how far the power extends. I do not undertake, at this point, to enumerate the things which Congress may do under this power; but I do say that no lawyer who examines the decisions upon this subject can maintain for a moment that Congress does not have this power, and that it does not extend to the regulation of commerce as carried on by railroads. It is one of the wonderful things in connection with the Constitution of the United States, it is one of those things which exhibit the wisdom of our fathers who framed it, that it has shown its capacity to adapt itself to all the exigencies which have arisen in that eventful period of history since it was adopted.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, when our fathers inserted in the Constitution the provision under which I claim this power, namely, that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes," the convention which adopted that provision did not have in its eye a commerce conducted by means of railroads, because railroads had not been thought of at the time the Constitution was adopted. But they were too wise to limit the power of regulation to any particular mode of carrying on commerce. If they had limited it to the kind of commerce that existed at that day, and to the kind of vehicles by which commerce was carried on at that period, the power would only have extended to commerce carried either by wagons on land or sailing-vessels on water. Steamships and steam-cars were not then engines and agencies for carrying on the commerce of the country as they are to-day; but they wisely made the Constitution an instrument of enumeration and not of definition. They used the word "commerce," and the Supreme Court has well decided that that word means commerce however carried on, by whatever means, whether on land or water, whether on steamboat or steam-cars.

I wish to call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, very briefly to the authorities upon which I base my declaration here, that we have power to regulate this class of commerce, which is my first proposition; and I will in the first place ask the Clerk to read an extract from the opinion in the case known as the Clinton Bridge case, reported in 1 Woolworth's Circuit Court Reports, from the language of the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, then sitting in the circuit court.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the Constitution was adopted. By it merchandise is transported across states and kingdoms in the same vehicle in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has, with great benefit, been subjected to the control of salutary congressional legislation. Is there any reason why the other should not be? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a State, and which is therefore neither foreign commerce nor commerce among the States, it seems to me that when these roads become parts of the great highways of our Union, acting an important part in a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of those roads are, to become channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce both with foreign nations and among the States, and to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government.

Mr. McCRARY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to read a paragraph from the article to which I have already referred, written by Judge Redfield, and I may have occasion to refer to this article several times. I do this because of the high standing of the author of the article. He tells us in the article itself that he has been engaged in the investigation of this subject of railway laws, as a specialty, for a long time, almost the period of the life of a generation. Every gentleman knows that he is the author of a number of works which constitute standard authorities in this country upon various subjects, and that upon this particular subject he is the author of a work which I do not hesitate to say stands at the head of the authorities in this country.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman refer to Judge Redfield, formerly of Vermont and now of Boston?

Mr. McCRARY. I do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He is the very highest authority.

Mr. McCRARY. It is not only because he is the very highest authority, as the gentleman suggests, but there is another reason why I wish to give prominence to his opinions in this discussion, and that is, that he belongs to that school of politicians who have always been very jealous of the encroachments of Federal power upon what are denominated the rights of the States.

Upon the question which I am now discussing, as to whether this power extends to the regulation of that commerce which is carried on by railroads, Judge Redfield uses this language:

> The power of Congress in regard to interstate commerce—that is, commerce between different States, whether two or more—is most unlimited, by the very terms of the national Constitution. It extends as far as the national sovereignty extends In regard to the regulation of fares and freights upon existing railways, Congress has the same power to regulate commerce among the States, whether upon land or water, and to the same extent that any national legislature has to regulate upon its railways or its vessels or ships of any kind. This will become very apparent by the consideration that this power resided, to its full extent, exclusively in the States before the adoption of the national Constitution, and that it was transferred entire to the national Government by enumerating among the exclusive powers delegated to the national Government the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

But it is unnecessary to discuss or to cite other authorities upon this subject, except one to which I wish now to call the attention of the House. This clause of the Constitution has been the subject of discussion in the Supreme Court of the United States in very many cases. It has been the subject of many elaborate and most able opinions emanating from that august tribunal. But the point to which I am now calling the attention of the House was fairly and squarely decided in a very recent case from the State of Pennsylvania, and reported in 15 Wallace's Reports, known as the State freight-tax case. In that case the question was as to the constitutionality of a statute passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania which imposed, or undertook to impose, a tax upon the tonnage of all freight carried upon railroads chartered by the State of Pennsylvania. That tax was attacked upon the ground that to impose a tax upon such freight as was carried across the State, or carried from within the State to a place without the State, was in the nature of a regulation of commerce, and therefore was beyond the power of the State and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the national Government. And the Supreme Court of the United States held the affirmative on both propositions. It held that to impose a tax upon freight carried on lines extending from State to State was a regulation of commerce, because it was the imposition of a rule or regulation for conducting and carrying on that commerce. And they held, secondly, that being in the nature of a regulation of commerce, it was not only beyond the power of the State, but it was exclusively within the power of the national Government. I cannot read at length from this opinion. Suffice it to say, it is an exhaustive treatise in itself upon the whole question. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Strong, and I may say, in passing, that I think he has not a superior upon that bench or any other in the land. I can take time to read but a few passages from his opinion:

> Beyond all question the transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce, for the purpose of exchange or sale, is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. * * * * Nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or by water. In either case the bringing of the goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce.

Upon the other point, as to whether this power is exclusively in Congress or not, I wish to quote from the same authority.

Let me say in passing, so that there may be no misapprehension upon this point, that there has been in the Supreme Court of the United States a class of cases in which this opinion has been expressed, although perhaps it has never been distinctly decided, that the right to do that which is in the nature of a regulation of commerce may be exercised by the States until Congress has assumed jurisdiction over it. But this class of cases has been limited strictly to those which apply to the bridging of small rivers within any State or to building dams across those rivers, and never has been extended to any regulation of commerce which in the nature of things requires or admits of a national regulation.

But, Mr. Speaker, the opinion from which I am about to read will express this idea more clearly than I can express it:

It is not necessary to the present case to go at large into the much-debated question whether the power given to Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States is exclusive. In the earlier decisions of this court it was said to have been so entirely vested in Congress, that no part of it can be exercised by a State. It has indeed often been argued, and sometimes intimated by the court, that so far as Congress has not legislated on the subject, the States may legislate respecting interstate commerce.

Then comes this language, to which I wish to call attention:

Yet, if they can, why may they not add regulations to commerce with foreign nations, beyond those made by Congress, if not inconsistent with them? For the power over both foreign and interstate commerce is conferred upon the Federal Legislature by the same words. And certainly it has never yet been decided by this court that the power to regulate interstate, as well as foreign commerce, is not exclusively in Congress. Cases that have sustained State laws, alleged to be regulations of commerce among the States, have been such as related to bridges or dams across streams wholly within a State, police, or health laws, or subjects of a kindred nature, not strictly commercial "regulations."

Then comes the final decision of the court:

However this may be, the rule has been asserted with great clearness, that whenever the subjects over which a power to regulate commerce is asserted are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Surely transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State, or from one State to another, is of this nature.

By this case, then, it is distinctly held, first, that wherever the subjects over which the power to regulate is sought to be exercised are in their nature national, so as to admit of one general and uniform system of regulation, there the power to regulate is exclusively in Congress; and, secondly, that the carrying of freight from one State to another is of this character.

Let me say here that in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in 9 Wheaton, to which I shall presently refer upon another point, the power to regulate is extended and applied to steam-vessels, and in the State freight-tax case the power to regulate was extended and applied to railroads.

There is, then, Mr. Speaker, no room to doubt that I am right upon my second proposition; namely, that this power of regulation, whatever it may be, however far it may extend, may be applied to the regulation of that kind of commerce which is carried on among the several States by means of railroads.

Let us inquire then, Mr. Speaker, in the next place, whether this power to regulate this commerce may be exercised by providing, as this bill proposes, that persons engaged in it shall not be guilty of extortion or of unjust discrimination. If this is not a regulation of commerce, will some gentleman tell me what it is? Is it not a rule for the government and control of the persons engaged in this commerce? The rule is that they shall charge only that which is reasonable; the rule is that they shall not be guilty of unjust discriminations. If these are not rules, what are they? A regulation is simply a rule. The regulation of commerce, as was declared by Chief Justice Marshall in the opinion in Gibbons vs. Ogden is the prescribing of rules for carrying on commerce.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will not ask the House to rest upon my opinion on this subject. I wish to call attention now to some authority upon this point. In no case among the many in which this power to regulate commerce has been discussed has the subject been considered so exhaustively as in the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, the opinion in which was announced by Chief Justice Marshall himself. I beg the indulgence of the House while I quote (not at any very great length) from this decision, upon the question as to the nature and extent of the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution of the United States to regulate commerce among the several States. Chief Justice Marshall says:

To what commerce does this power extend? The Constitution informs us, to commerce "with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." It has, we believe, been universally admitted that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other to which this power does not extend. It has been truly said that commerce, as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term. If this be the admitted meaning of the word in its application to foreign nations, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence, and remain a unit, unless there be some plain, intelligible cause which alters it. The object to which the power is next applied is to commerce "among the several States." The word "among" means intermingled with.

I wish gentlemen to weigh the force of this language. Our power is not limited to the mere crossing of a State line, but extends to all that commerce which is intermingled with the States, beginning in one State and ending in another, and therefore, in the very nature of things, beyond the reach and control of any single State.

A thing which is among others is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior.

It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States. Such a power would be inconvenient, and certainly is not necessary. Comprehensive as the word "among" is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a State, because it is not an apt phrase for that purpose; and the enumeration of the particular classes of commerce to which the power was to be extended would not have been made, had the intention been to extend the power to every description. The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated, and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of a State.

I think, Mr. Speaker, there cannot be found anywhere a better definition of the appropriate jurisdiction of Congress and of the line which marks the division between State and Federal power than is found in the following language of Chief Justice Marshall in the opinion to which I am referring:

The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be, that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular State which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government. The completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am now dwelling more particularly upon the question as to the nature and extent of this power to regulate commerce; and upon this point allow me to quote from this opinion:

It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself; may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms and do not affect the questions which arise in this case, or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects—

Mark the words, Mr. Speaker, "is plenary as to those objects"— the power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States. The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections—are in this, as in many other instances—as that, for example, of declaring war—the sole restraints on which they have relied to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints upon which the people must often rely solely in all representative governments.

Which, I apprehend, sir, we can all appreciate here—

According, then, to this opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, our power under this clause of the Constitution is complete in itself. It is plenary as to every one of the objects enumerated. It acknowledges no limitations other than those found in the Constitution itself, and it is equal in extent with the power of any single government having in its organic law no other restraint than we find in the Constitution.

Now, sir, will it be said that a power which is thus plenary, a legislative power which is thus complete, does not authorize Congress to say to those men engaged in commerce among the several States, "You shall discharge the duties you assume as common carriers under the common law, and this shall be one of the rules and regulations concerning the commerce in which you are engaged?" Will any gentleman assert that plenary power cannot require of these common carriers the discharge of this plain, simple, just requirement of the common law itself as well as of justice and equity?

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, upon this question, to read again from the article of Judge Redfield. He says:

We are not aware that any fair question can be raised in regard to the right of Congress to control the fares and freights upon interstate railways. No such question has been raised in England in regard to the power of Parliament, and we do not comprehend how one could be raised in any country, unless there were some constitutional restriction upon the sovereign power.

And I may as well say here, as I failed to do it in more appropriate connection, that the Parliament of Great Britain has for many years provided for the regulation of fares and freights on the railroads of that country. And if Chief Justice Marshall was right in saying the power of Congress is plenary, and is as great as that of any single government, then, of course, it follows that Judge Redfield is right in saying that no fair question can be made as to the power of Congress to enact this regulation.

I read again from Judge Redfield:

In the absence of all such restriction the supreme power might impose conditions upon existing companies which would annihilate their business at once. But of course we name this only to show the unlimited nature of the power, and not because we suppose it would ever be resorted to. This is admitted by all in regard to the legislative power of the British Parliament; and we have never been able to find any one who could assign any sensible reason why the legislative power of the American Legislatures, both State and national, in the absence of constitutional restrictions, should be less than that of the British Parliament.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. McCRARY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like to know of the gentleman whether he thinks there is any parallel between the power of the British Parliament and that of the Congress of the United States? Does not this distinction exist, that Congress has "only such power as is expressed in the Constitution," while the power of the Parliament of Great Britain has no constitutional restraint, but is held by itself and by the government of Great Britain to be without limitation of power; that the British Parliament is held to have all the power which any government can exercise, while the Government of the United States must find in its Constitution the express right to power for whatever it shall attempt to do?

Mr. McCRARY. I might concede to my friend from Wisconsin, whom I know to be an extreme advocate of the doctrine of State rights, that Congress has no power except that which is expressly conferred by the Constitution itself. I do not concede that. We have established national banks, and we have done a great many things where the right was derived, not from express provision, but fair and necessary implication; for the purpose of this argument, however, I can plant my feet upon the extreme doctrine of the State-rights democracy and still maintain my position against the gentleman from Wisconsin or anybody else, because nobody can deny the declaration of Chief Justice Marshall, that as to powers expressly conferred upon Congress, the jurisdiction and sovereignty of Congress are supreme and plenary. It acknowledges no limitation unless the limitation is found in the Constitution; and there is no limitation in the Constitution upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce. And since the power is given and is not limited by the Constitution, it can have no limitation other than the wisdom and discretion of Congress acting, as Judge Marshall says, under their responsibility to the people.

Now, I say again, as I said awhile ago, that we can adopt this proposition if it be in the nature of a regulation. Is it not in the nature of a regulation? In deciding the State freight-tax cases, the Supreme Court of the United States put this decision solely and entirely upon the fact that to put taxes upon commerce or upon freight to be carried from one State to another was in the nature of a regulation; and therefore they held that, as to all freight carried from one State into another, and as to all freight carried across a State, this regulation can only be provided by the action of Congress. I desire to read a sentence from the opinion of Mr. Justice Strong in this case:

Then why is not a tax upon freight transported from State to State a regulation of interstate transportation, and therefore a regulation of commerce among the States? Is it not prescribing a rule for the transporter by which he is to be controlled in bringing the subjects of commerce into the State and in taking them out?

There is the test which the Supreme Court puts, in order to determine whether this thing is a regulation of commerce or not. Is it any less, I ask again, a regulation to provide that the transporter shall be limited in his charges to such as are reasonable and to such as are just and equitable? I think then, Mr. Speaker, I am entirely justified in saying that both upon authority and upon reason, the proposition contained in this bill is a fair regulation of commerce, and that if it be adopted it will be held to be a proper and legitimate exercise of the power of Congress to regulate commerce.

But I must pass on to say a few words as to the question of the expediency of this measure. It may be said that it is not expedient to pass this bill, and possibly it may be said that it is not competent for us to pass the bill, for the reason that it interferes with the right and power of the several States to control the corporations created by them. Sir, no man believes more firmly than I do that each and every State has a right to control the corporations which it creates. But, sir, when it is contended that a State may charter a private corporation and may authorize that corporation to engage in interstate commerce, and by this means defeat the power of Congress to regulate that commerce, then I deny that the State has that power. No State has any power to charter a corporation and authorize it to engage in interstate commerce; or if it has that power, it must authorize it to engage in that kind of commerce, subject to the power of Congress to regulate and to control it. The moment a State corporation engages in interstate commerce, that moment it comes within the power and jurisdiction of the national Government. If we were to concede that the mere fact that the State has created a corporation which has engaged in interstate commerce deprives Congress of all power over that kind of commerce, we would concede to the States the right to abrogate the Constitution itself; we would concede to the States the power to deny the exercise by Congress of the power conferred upon it by the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair.) The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. ARTHUR. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is moved that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. McCRARY. I thank the House for its indulgence, and will endeavor to conclude as soon as I can.

The question whether a State may regulate fares and charges upon railroads chartered by the State does not arise in the discussion of this bill. It has been a question in the courts of our country whether the States in some cases have not forfeited their right to regulate fares and freight by the terms of the charters they have conferred upon these corporations. The railroad companies endeavor to shelter themselves under the Dartmouth College decision. They insist that their charters are contracts between them and the States, and that they authorize the companies to fix at their discretion the rates which they will charge. I do not think they stand in the category of the corporations referred to in the Dartmouth College case. They are public corporations. They exercise the functions of the State, as was well said by Mr. Justice Strong in another case, reported in 16 Wallace—Olcott vs. The Supervisors. But that question does not arise here. Whether any State in any given case has forfeited its right to control the charges of railroads within its own limits is not a question which arises upon this bill.

Whatever restriction a State may have placed upon its own power, it has in no case, because it cannot do it, placed any restriction upon the power of the national Government. The power of Congress to regulate commerce exists independently of the means and agencies by which that commerce is carried on. The power of a State to control its corporations must be exercised with reference to the subjects over which the State has jurisdiction, and the State cannot step out of its proper sphere and by a contract made with a corporation within its limits tie the hands of the national Government in this matter of the regulation of commerce. The power of the State to regulate must be limited to such contracts, transactions, and engagements as are subject to be regulated and controlled by State law, and cannot affect any subject-matter which comes within the jurisdiction and control of national law.

And let me say here that the Committee on Railways and Canals, in preparing and reporting this bill, have not gone as far as some gentlemen desired to go; have not gone as far as some gentlemen on the committee would have been willing to go. But in view of the fact that this is a pioneer measure on this subject, the committee have thought it best to keep, clearly and distinctly, within the provisions of the common law itself, and to propose no regulations which any fair-minded man can say is not just and reasonable.

If, Mr. Speaker, the rates charged by railroad companies for carrying freight and passengers were fixed in the manner that most prices are fixed, by fair, open, free competition, it might not, and I apprehend it would not, be necessary for Congress to interpose. The wrongs of which we hear so much, the injustice of which there is so much complaint, the discrimination which is so common and so unjust, probably would never have existed if the rates of freights were fixed, as I have said, by free and open and fair competition. But, sir, every gentleman knows well that the rates charged by these great corporations are fixed not by competition but by combination; and it was the shrewd aphorism of old George Stephenson, "that competition is impossible wherever combination is possible." Upon this subject, Mr. Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts, who has made this question a study, has given us a better statement of the facts than I can give myself. He says, in an address recently delivered before a committee of the Massachusetts Legislature:

Take, I pray you, the case of New York and Chicago, two cities a thousand miles apart, between which railroads have been constructed as fast as private capital could construct them. Every gentleman on this committee knows that not a rate is charged between New York and Chicago which is not established by combination. You know that every time the tariff is to be raised or lowered, the freight agents of the several companies meet in convention, and they decide how much it shall be raised, or how much it shall be lowered, and the change agreed upon takes effect upon all the roads on a given day. You know—every man who has looked into this subject knows—that the only competition which exists is between land transportation and water transportation. When water enters into the struggle, when navigation opens, then the freight agents meet, and rates are reduced; when the lakes freeze up, then the freight agents meet again, and the rates are raised. Whether reduced or raised, however, the change always is the result of combination.

Again, let us look at this question from another point of view. The idea of competition certainly implies the existence of several agents. As regards railroads, however, even the combination of competitors is limited to a few localities. Except at competing points—points, that is, upon which railroads converge—transportation by rail is a pure, absolute monopoly, affected only by municipal law and considerations of self-interest, and in no degree subject to the influence either of competition or of supply and demand. Now how large a proportion of all the towns on our railroads are points of railroad convergence? In other words, how many of them can look to competition for even a pretense of protection against monopoly? Take, for example, the Boston and Albany road. It runs through a densely inhabited region, filled with manufacturing cities and towns. It is two hundred miles in length, it has eighty stopping places; but of points of railroad convergence—places at which a possibility of competition exists—it numbers just seven. Take, again, the Central road of New York. Including its Auburn division, it has four hundred and five miles of road in the very garden and central thoroughfare of the continent; on the whole four hundred miles there exist just nine points of convergence. Six hundred miles of railroad, with sixteen competing points; and those inhabiting all the other localities may use the Central or the Boston and Albany, as the case may be, or they may stay at home—whichever they prefer. But is it not something of a mockery to refer this system for its regulation to the principles which control the production of boots and cotton cloth? And if this is so here, in the manufacturing East, it is not hard to imagine what must result in the agricultural West, where the very nature of the leading industry renders it impossible for population to concentrate at points of railroad convergence. In the West, the mass of the people feel themselves helpless, and hence the angry feeling now prevailing against the railroad companies throughout that region.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in confirmation of the statement of Mr. Adams, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that on the 30th day of December last the agents of the several great trunk lines of railroad extending from the West to the East assembled in the city of New York, and increased the prices to be charged upon every pound of freight to be brought from the West to the East at least 33 per cent., and they were honest enough in the proceedings of their meeting to record the fact why they did it. Was it because they had been charging freights that were too low? Was it because they had made no money during the summer? Not at all, Mr. Speaker; but because the lakes had frozen up, and the competition between water transportation and land transportation had ceased for the time being. I beg leave to have read from the New York Tribune of the 1st of January the proceedings of this meeting, which are very brief:

The Clerk read as follows:

For some time past the subject of an increase of freight rates to the West by the trunk lines, as the New York Central, Erie, and Pennsylvania Railroads are known, has been discussed by the officials of the roads mentioned. Heretofore the rates have been raised when navigation on the lakes closed, as then the competition by steamers is abruptly ended. It is understood that this year the opposition of the Grand Trunk Railroad of Canada and the Vermont Central Railroad has been the cause of the delay in raising the rates to and from the West. The new rates go into effect from January 1. The following is a comparative statement of the old and new rates for the five classes of freight per one hundred pounds:

To Cleveland—Old rate, 49, 46, 39, 30, 23; new rate, 65, 59, 49, 39, 30.
To Cincinnati—Old rate, 70, 64, 55, 41, 32; new rate, 92, 83, 70, 55, 41.
To Indianapolis—Old rate, 71, 66, 57, 43, 33; new rate, 95, 85, 71, 57, 43.
To Louisville—Old rate, 86, 81, 71, 55, 44; new rate, 113, 102, 86, 71, 55.
To Saint Louis—Old rate, 97, 91, 79, 61, 49; new rate, 128, 116, 97, 79, 61.
To Quincy—Old rate, 97, 91, 79, 61, 49; new rate, 128, 116, 97, 79, 61.
To Chicago—Old rate, 75, 70, 60, 45, 35; new rate, 100, 90, 70, 60, 45.
To Detroit—Old rate, 53, 49, 42, 32, 25; new rate, 70, 63, 53, 42, 32.
To Toledo—Old rate, 58, 54, 46, 35, 29; new rate, 77, 64, 58, 46, 35.

These figures interest all shippers, either East or West. The increased rate has been anticipated for some time past, and therefore it will not cause much surprise. In consequence of this belief, large quantities of freight have been sent forward during the past two or three weeks, and it is probable that shippers will, during the next three days, forward all the freight they can in order to take advantage of the old schedule of rates.

Mr. McCRARY. An examination of these figures will show that the rates were raised something more than 33 per cent. Upon that same subject I beg leave to read a paragraph or two from Judge Redfield. He says, speaking of railroad commerce:

It has become so indispensable to the very existence of the country, and such an overwhelming monopoly, that the very life of all the internal trade and commerce of the country is already at its mercy, and must forever remain so, unless Congress shall interpose some effective remedy. The States have, as we have seen, no power to act in the matter of interstate communication, and this is the principal seat of the difficulty; and if the States had now the same power they had under the old Confederation, it needs no argument to show that forty independent legislatures could never agree upon any effective system of interstate commercial intercourse, or even if they could agree upon such a plan, which is scarcely less than impossible, they have no combined judicial machinery to carry it into effect. There could be no hope of relief from any imaginable source but in the national prerogatives.

And here let me call the attention of the House to the fact stated by Judge Redfield, that we are driven to one of two alternatives: either the regulation of this vast and rapidly increasing commerce among the States by national legislation, or else that it shall remain permanently without any regulation at all, and I ask gentlemen to consider seriously whether this great commerce; whether these vast combinations, whether these powerful monopolies which have to do with the rights and interests of all of our forty millions of people, ought to be left entirely free and independent of any legislative control or regulations.

The States cannot regulate them. Any attempt by the States will be held void, as the State tax of Pennsylvania was held void. And the question now confronts us, whether we shall allow this commerce to remain without regulation, or assert the power which the Constitution confers upon the Government of the United States. Judge Redfield further says:

The result is entirely certain, that if the railways are allowed to pursue the unrestrained course now entered upon by them, the expenses of transportation will ultimately absorb all the profits of interstate trade and manufactures. Foreign transportation, and that upon the coast or the navigable rivers among the States, requires no such stringent rules of limitation; competition is so free and unrestrained there as to correct any evil tendency in this direction. But railways are absolutely beyond all healthy competition.

I beg to call the attention of the House to a fact or two in illustration of the necessity for this legislation, which I find in the speech of Charles Francis Adams from which I have already quoted. I wish particularly to direct the attention of the House to a fact which he states, and which is the statement of one isolated fact which may be multiplied by tens of thousands all over the country:

In the State of Massachusetts, since I have been a commissioner, a railroad superintendent has frankly acknowledged to me that where freight was shipped and paid for to the end of the line, if that freight was switched off at a non-competing point but ten miles from where it came on to his line, and a hundred miles short of its paid destination, he always charged the cars containing that freight twenty dollars extra. Twenty dollars for not hauling it one hundred miles. And he justified his extortion.

He also in a note calls attention to some facts which were brought to light at a meeting held in Rochester, New York, by the business men of that place. It appeared that goods could be sent from New York to Indianapolis for twenty-five cents per hundred pounds, when the freight from Rochester to the same place was from one dollar to one dollar and a quarter per hundred pounds. One firm had paid one dollar and thirty cents from Rochester to Hannibal, Missouri, while at the same time the same class of freight was shipped from Worcester, Massachusetts, to Hannibal, for sixty cents per hundred pounds, and from Philadelphia for forty cents. But I will not delay the House by an enumeration of instances of this character. Everybody knows, it is the experience of mankind, that a monopoly is a dangerous thing, and that it is not safe to allow, and we cannot adopt as a permanent policy of this country, that these interstate railroads, being above the control of the States, shall be permitted to fix at their own will, and subject to no law whatever, the price which they will charge for transportation.

Mr. Speaker, it can do no harm to say to these men, "You shall charge only that which is reasonable;" it can do no harm to say to these men, "You shall not be guilty of unjust discrimination," if you allow them to go before the courts and try the question, as they might try it at common law, as to what is just and what is unjust.

I would like to quote once more—at the risk of wearying the House—from an authority which I think will have great weight with some gentlemen upon this floor. I mean Mr. John Stuart Mill. I read from the second volume of his Political Economy. Speaking of railways and canals he says:

There are always, in a great degree, practical monopolies; and a government which concedes such monopolies unreservedly to a private company does much the same thing as if it allowed an individual or an association to levy any tax they chose for their own benefit on all the malt produced in the country, or on all the cotton imported into it. To make the concession for a limited time is generally justifiable, on the principle which justifies patents for inventions; but the state should either reserve to itself a reversionary property in such public works, or should retain and freely exercise the right of fixing a maximum of fares and charges, and from time to time varying that maximum.

Mr. Mill, I may say in passing, was not one of those economists who believe in any improper or extravagant exercise of the functions of the government.

But I have heard it said, as an objection to the expediency of the legislation now proposed, that the charges of these railroads were only sufficient to pay a fair dividend or interest upon the cost of their construction and operation. Sir, a little investigation of the subject will show that the stock issued by these corporations represents, in most cases, far more than the actual cost of their construction and their improvement. A gentleman who has given this subject a great deal of study, who is himself a gentleman of great learning, I mean Mr. Hubbard, of Boston, who has laid a memorial upon this subject before the House, has stated some facts bearing upon the point that I now wish to make. That point is that we ought to raise such a commission as this bill proposes. We ought to have an inquiry as to what these lines have cost. We ought to have an adjudication of what is a fair dividend for them to receive, and then they ought to be limited in some way so that they should not receive more. He says:

The Syracuse and Utica section of the New York Central Railroad, it is said, cost $800,000, and is now represented in stock and debt by $6,800,000. The total capital of the New York Central road is over $100,000,000. Its stock dividends in two years were $45,000,000; nearly equal to the entire cost of the road.

Who pays this interest and these dividends upon this watered stock? These profits must be made up by exorbitant charges upon the people who patronize the road.

The annual dividend (8 per cent.) paid on this fictitious stock is equal to nearly 15 per cent. of the gross receipts; that is, the rates might be one-seventh less than they are if this stock dividend had not been declared. The directors and stockholders of this corporation are not guilty beyond others; they have only carried out the principles upon which all roads are conducted, and which the public has tolerated.

Sir, is there no remedy for this? Shall the Congress of the United States say that there is no relief, that no part of the burden which these corporations thus impose upon the people can be lifted?

This gentleman states some other interesting facts, showing the great value of a commission such as this bill proposes to organize, with power to gather statistics, to compel returns, to ascertain facts in regard to this commerce. In the State of Massachusetts there is such a commission, and one of the facts ascertained by the reports of that commission is, that in 1873 the cost of moving a train of cars was $1.26 per mile. Now, there is a basis upon which can be made a calculation from which we can learn how much beyond the actual cost of transportation the people of this country annually pay for carrying freight over these railroads. Mr. Hubbard calls attention to these facts:

In the year 1873 about three hundred and fifty million bushels of grain raised in the valley of the Mississippi were transported by railroad to the Atlantic slope; the average freight per bushel was 50 cents. In the same year the average cost per train per mile on all the railroads in Massachusetts was $1.26.

At this rate, the cost of moving a train of thirty cars, of ten tons each, from the Mississippi River to New York, by an air-line railroad, would have been $1,260, or 12.8 cents per bushel. Allowing an equal sum for interest and dividends on the cost of a railroad connecting the same points, or 50 per cent. of the gross receipts, wheat could have been transported to New York at 24.2 cents per bushel—equal to a saving of $85,000,000 on the amount transported.

Will any gentleman say that that is reasonable and just? Will any gentleman say that it is sound policy for us to concede here and now that there is and can be no remedy? Take the distance from Chicago to New York. Mr. Hubbard's calculation is on the basis of the distance from the Mississippi River to New York; but making the same calculation for the distance between Chicago and New York, you will find, supposing the cost to be the same per mile as in Massachusetts, that the actual cost of transportation was 10.7 cents per bushel. We know very well that the actual charge is about four times that rate.

Now, sir, I do not undertake to say what the rate ought to be. That is a question of some difficulty. I think Congress would be greatly embarrassed if it should attempt to fix in any bill an iron rule to apply to all railroads. But I do say that a commission organized under the provisions of this bill, with power to make investigation, to take testimony, to examine books and records, can, upon an ascertainment of the facts, prepare a schedule of reasonable rates, which will at least have value enough to be justly received in a court of justice as prima facie evidence of what is fair.

To meet the objection which may be raised here against the attempt to have prepared a schedule which shall be prima facie evidence as to a fair and just charge, I desire to cite some authorities in support of the principle that the proper legislative authority may declare what shall be prima facie evidence in the trial of causes in the courts of the country; that the rules of evidence as they exist at common law are subject to be changed from time to time by legislative authority. I ask attention to the following authorities, which I find referred to in the recent report of the Illinois railway commissioners:

Judge Cooley, in his able treatise on the constitutional limitations which rest upon the legislative power of States, says: "It must be evident that a right to have one's controversies determined by existing rules of evidence is not a vested right.

These rules pertain to the remedies which the State provides for its citizens; and generally in legal contemplation they neither enter into and constitute a part of any contract, nor can be regarded as being of the essence of any right which a party may seek to enforce. Like other rules affecting the remedy, they must, therefore, at all times be subject to modification and control by the Legislature, and the changes which are enacted may lawfully be made applicable to existing causes of action, even in those States in which retrospective laws are forbidden. For the law as changed would only prescribe rules for presenting the evidence in legal controversies in the future; and it could not, therefore, be called retrospective, even though some of the controversies upon which it may act were in progress before. It has accordingly been held in New Hampshire that a statute which removed the disqualifications of interest, and allowed parties to suits to testify, might lawfully apply to existing causes of action. So may a statute which modifies the common-law rule excluding parol evidence to vary the terms of a written contract; and a statute making the protest of a promissory note evidence of the facts therein stated. These and the like cases sufficiently illustrate the general rule, that the whole subject is under the control of the Legislature, which prescribes such rules for the trial and determination as well of existing as of future rights and controversies as in its judgment will most completely subserve the ends of justice." (Page 367.)

These propositions of the text are fully sustained by numerous authorities cited in the notes.

In Ogden vs. Saunders, (12 Wheaton, 349,) Chief Justice Marshall, after considering statutes of frauds, statutes against usury, and statutes of limitations, says: "All have acquiesced in these enactments, but have never considered them as being of that class of laws which impair the obligations of contracts. In prescribing the evidence which shall be received in its courts, and the effect of that evidence, the State is exercising its acknowledged powers. It is likewise in the exercise of its legitimate powers when it is regulating the remedy and mode of proceedings in its courts."

In Commonwealth vs. Williams, (6 Gray, 1,) it was held by the supreme court of Massachusetts that a statute providing that in prosecutions for common selling of spirituous and intoxicating liquors, delivery in or from any building or place, other than a dwelling-house, "shall be deemed prima facie evidence of a sale," was constitutional and valid. The court says, "It is no new thing in the history or administration of the law that peculiar and artificial force is given or attributed to particular facts or series of facts, as means and instruments of legal proof. This may be seen in many of the rules of evidence which prevail by the common law, and in others which derive their force from legislative acts. These, then, are conclusive presumptions, which from motives of public policy, or for the sake of greater certainty, or for the promotion of the peace and quiet of the community, have been adopted by common consent. Sometimes the common consent by which this class of presumption is established, is declared through the medium of the judicial tribunals, and thus becomes a part of the common law of the land. And sometimes it is expressly declared by the direct authority of the Legislature, in statutes duly enacted."

In Hand vs. Ballou, (12 New York, 543,) the court say, "The Legislature certainly have power to determine, by law, what shall in civil cases be received by the courts as presumptive evidence."

In Allen vs. Armstrong, (16 Iowa, 513,) the court, per Dillon, J., say, "That the Legislature is competent to declare that the tax deed shall be presumptive or prima facie evidence of the regularity and validity of all prior proceedings is everywhere admitted."

In 13 Howard, 476, the Supreme Court of the United States, per Grier, J., say, "The power of the Legislature to make the deed of a public officer prima facie evidence of the regularity of the previous proceedings cannot be doubted."

But it may be said, Mr. Speaker, that we are seeking the remedy in the wrong direction. There is a class of persons who say that this whole problem is to be solved by improving our existing water-routes and by opening up new ones in different parts of the country. No gentleman on this floor is more thoroughly in favor of improving our water-routes than I am. I know that water transportation is one of the important factors in the solution of this question. But I also know that though you may expend any amount of money in the improvement of the Mississippi River or any other line of water communication, you will still need the aid of legislation in order to compel railroad companies to carry to and connect with these routes upon fair and reasonable terms. Whoever has tried the experiment of carrying grain or produce from a point one hundred miles from the Mississippi River to the banks of that stream, and then down the river by boat, knows that the railroads running to that river will discriminate against river commerce to such an extent as to destroy, practically, all its advantages. We may expect that corporations will act as their interest dictates. Experience proves that they invariably do this. Railroad corporations have always done it, and always will do it, until they are compelled by law to carry their freights to and connect with the water-routes on fair terms.

There is another class of gentlemen who say the problem must be solved by building a Government line of railroad. I will not discuss that proposition, but will only say here and now, a proposition to build a railroad, either in whole or in part, with money from the national Treasury, should be considered only, if at all, as a last resort; but if we had such a railroad we would still need the control of other railroads to compel them to connect with it, for the same reasons I have already given.

Another objection to the bill is that which I have heard some gentlemen suggest—that it is impossible to do this. Some gentlemen concede that the power exists, and that it is in Congress, but say it cannot be exercised. They say no commission, however learned and able, can make a schedule of reasonable rates. Are they ready to concede that railroad companies possess all the talent and all the ability in the land? They must concede that if they take that position, for the railroads are operated now and must always be operated upon schedules of rates. The officers and agents of these companies themselves do the very thing this bill provides a commission shall do. They divide all freight to be transported into four or five different classes, and fix the rate on each. Surely a commission of honest and able men, after examining the whole subject, after taking testimony, after informing themselves as fully as railroad companies themselves are informed, can discharge this same duty.

Everybody knows that the great work of such a commission would be to consider what is a fair rate for the transportation of the products of the agricultural regions of the country to the sea-board. That is the first great question to be considered. It will have to be considered perhaps long and carefully. The commission may require time to do it. They are given time by this bill. They are, "as soon as practicable after such investigation" is concluded, to prepare and publish a schedule, &c.

I think, sir, it does not become the Congress of the United States to say that it has not power to exercise any authority which is conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States. The American people will not tolerate such a doctrine. These great corporations and this immense commerce must and will be controlled. They will not be left permanently free from any regulation. They are not or ought not to be above the law. If this Congress shall conclude that it cannot regulate them, another Congress will be sent here that will hold a different view. There is no more vital question which agitates the people of this country than this. These great and rapidly increasing commercial interests imperatively demand regulation and control by law. Here is the power, and the only power on earth, which has the right and upon which devolves the duty of adopting such a remedy as the case requires. I hope, sir, this Congress will not hesitate to discharge its duty in the premises.

I thank the House for the indulgence they have extended to me of speaking almost twice as long as I intended, and much longer than the rules allow.

Mr. MELLISH. I would suggest to the gentleman to move that the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as the copies on file have been exhausted.

Mr. MCCRARY. I ask unanimous consent, as suggested, that the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as the usual supply of copies has been exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each and every line of railroad extending into or through two or more States, and employed in carrying freight or passengers between points or places in different States, and whether owned and operated by one company, corporation, or person, and known by one name, or owned and operated by several companies, corporations, or persons, and known by several different names, shall be regarded as employed in commerce among the several States; and the company or companies, corporation or corporations, person or persons, owning or operating such line of railroad shall be, both jointly and severally, liable for any violation of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That no such company, corporation, or person so engaged in operating a line of railroad into or through two or more States as aforesaid shall charge, collect, demand, or receive more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of freight of any kind, or of passengers, or for the use or transportation of any railroad car upon its track, loaded or unloaded, between places in different States. Such reasonable rate of toll or compensation shall be ascertained and fixed in the manner hereinafter provided. And for each and every violation of this act, by charging, collecting, demanding, or receiving more than such reasonable rate, the person or persons so offending shall be jointly and severally liable for extortion, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a board of railroad commissioners, which shall consist of nine members, one of whom shall be selected from, and be a resident of, each of the judicial circuits of the United States. Said board shall be composed of disinterested persons, and no person shall be a member thereof who is in any manner interested in the stock, bonds, or property of any railroad or other transportation company; and the duties of said board shall be as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 4. That the members of said board shall hold their offices for a term of six years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President; and they shall receive, as full compensation for their services, the sum of $4,000 per annum each, and their actual and necessary traveling expenses, to be stated under oath, and audited as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct. At the first meeting of the board after their appointment, they shall divide themselves by lot into three classes. The members of the first class shall continue for two years; of the second class, for four years; of the third class, for six years, so that one-third may be appointed every second year. And whenever vacancies shall occur in said board, the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall fill such vacancies by appointment for the unexpired portion of said term.

SEC. 5. That said board of railroad commissioners shall institute a thorough investigation and inquiry into the rates of toll and compensation charged for transporting freights and passengers over each of such lines of railroad as are herein described and designated, and into the reasonableness thereof; and shall, as soon as practicable after such investigation and inquiry, prepare for the owners and operators of each of such lines (except such as may be omitted as hereinafter provided) a separate schedule of reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers, and freight, and cars, loaded or unloaded, on or over said lines respectively. Said schedule shall be duly authenticated by said board of commissioners, shall be printed, and kept posted up in each of the offices and depots of such railroad company, corporation, or person. Each commissioner shall certify under his hand a printed or written copy of every schedule, and of every amendment to or revision of any schedule affecting any line of railroad extending into his circuit, and cause the same to be filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court for his circuit as soon as possible after the completion of such schedule or of such amendment or revision; and such official copy, when so filed, shall be received and held in all courts as conclusive evidence of said schedules, whether original, amended, or revised, and of all things therein contained. Copies of the same, duly certified from said circuit clerk's office, shall be received and read as evidence on any trial, in any court, to the same extent as the original on file. And from and after the filing of such original, amended, or revised schedules in the clerk's office, the railroad companies, and all others interested therein, shall be deemed affected by notice thereof, and of the contents of the same. For the purpose of prosecuting any investigation under this act, and for the purpose of ascertaining and fixing such reasonable maximum rates of charges, the said board shall have the power to administer oaths, to take the testimony of witnesses, to send for persons and papers, and to require the production before them of books, records, and papers; and for this purpose they may issue process, which shall be served by any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States. And in case any person summoned to appear as a witness before said board shall fail or refuse to appear, or if any person required by said board to produce before them any books, records, or papers in his possession, shall fail or refuse to produce the same, it shall be the duty of the board forthwith to report the facts to the nearest judge of the district or circuit court of the United States, who shall hear the matter summarily, whether in term time or vacation, and shall make such order in the premises as may be deemed proper to compel such person to appear before said board, and answer all proper questions and produce all papers, books, or records in his possession required by said board to be by him produced, and which, in the judgment of the court, are proper evidence to be considered by said board; and such judge may enforce his orders and punish disobedience thereto as in cases of contempt. Said commissioners may, from time to time, and so often as circumstances may require, change and revise said schedules, and shall give notice of such changes or revisions in the same manner as hereinbefore provided. The schedules aforesaid shall not be deemed invalid on account of any failure of the commissioners preparing the same to include therein all and every article or class of freight, but shall be held to be good and valid as to all articles or classes which are included or embraced therein; but it shall be the duty of such commissioners, whenever it comes to their knowledge that any article or class of freight has been omitted from any such schedule, to amend the same as soon as practicable by adding any such omitted articles or class: Provided, That if said board of railroad commissioners shall, after inquiry and investigation, be of the opinion that the charges of any one of the lines of railway described herein are already fair and reasonable, they may, in their discretion, omit to prepare a schedule for such line; but such omission shall only continue so long as the charges on such line shall continue to be fair and reasonable.

SEC. 6. That said board of railroad commissioners may sit at such place or places as they may see fit, and a majority of the members thereof shall constitute a quorum. A sub-committee of said board, of not less than three members, may sit for the purpose of taking testimony and making investigations under this act, and when so sitting such sub-committee shall have all the powers of said board in relation to taking testimony, administering oaths, issuing process, and compelling obedience thereto. Said board may also, at any time, depute any one of their number to take depositions, to be read in evidence at any hearing before the board, who shall have the same power to summon and examine witnesses and administer oaths as are herein given to the whole board. Persons duly summoned, who shall fail to appear or testify, or to produce any books, papers, or records in their possession when required, before such member, shall be liable to be proceeded against in the same way, and to the same penalties as are herein provided for failure or refusal to appear or testify, or to produce papers, records, or books, before the whole board.

SEC. 7. That said board of railroad commissioners shall be authorized to employ a secretary, who shall be paid an annual salary of $3,000, to be paid as other salaries; and they shall also choose their president, and may adopt such rules and regulations for the government of their proceedings, not inconsistent with this act, as they may see fit. Witnesses summoned to appear and testify before said board, who are not officers or agents of any railroad company concerned in the investigation, shall be allowed and paid the same fees as witnesses when summoned to appear and testify before the courts of the United States; said fees to be certified by the president and secretary of the board, and audited and paid as the Secretary of the Interior may direct: Provided, That no witness shall be summoned from a place outside of the district in which the board or sub-committee may be sitting, unless the distance be less than one hundred miles.

SEC. 8. That any corporation, company, or person being engaged in the operation of any line of railroad into or through two or more States or parts of States as aforesaid, who shall, after such schedule shall have taken effect in relation thereto, be guilty of extortion by charging, collecting, demanding, or receiving more than a reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of freight, passengers, or cars over or upon any such line, shall forfeit and pay for each offense a sum of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, to be recovered by action to be brought in the name of the United States in any district or circuit court of the United States, or if in a Territory, in any district court of the United States therein, in the form of an action of debt, or by such other form of action as may be provided by the law of the State in which such action is brought in like cases; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney for the proper district to institute and prosecute all suits for the recovery of the penalty aforesaid; and the corporation, company, or person being guilty of such extortion shall also be liable to the party injured thereby for the damages caused by such extortion, including a reasonable sum for attorneys' fees, to be fixed by the court trying the case, which such injured party may recover by action in his own name in either of the courts aforesaid; and the form of the action may be the same as in case of a suit to recover the penalty as hereinbefore provided. Either party to any action brought under the provisions of this act shall have the right to a trial by jury; and in any action instituted under the provisions of this act, whether it be a suit to recover the penalty aforesaid or a suit by the party injured to recover damages as aforesaid, any number of separate and distinct violations of the provisions of this act may be stated separately in separate counts, and a recovery may be had upon each. If, upon the trial of any such suit, brought either to recover said penalty or to recover damages as aforesaid, it shall be made to appear that the defendant has charged, collected, demanded, or received, for the transportation of freight, or passengers, or cars, a rate of toll or compensation greater than that fixed by the schedule aforesaid, then and in that case such defendant shall be deemed and held guilty of extortion, and liable therefor, unless such defendant shall show affirmatively that the rate charged, collected, demanded, or received for such transportation was, nevertheless, fair and reasonable: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed and taken to diminish or take away any common-law right of action on the part of individuals aggrieved against such railroad corporation or common carriers, or any action taken in the matter by any State so far as regards commerce within the control of such State.

SEC. 9. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all persons, firms, companies, or associations, whether incorporated or not, who are or may be engaged as carriers of freight and passengers, or in carrying freight only, or in carrying passengers only, upon any lines of railway extending into or through two or more States; but this act shall not be construed as extending to or affecting such commerce as is actually and in good faith completely internal within any one of the several States. Each of the schedules of charges herein provided shall take effect from and after thirty days from the date of its being filed in the clerk's office as aforesaid.

SEC. 10. That in all cases where two or more persons, companies, or corporations unite together for the purpose of transporting freight or passengers over several lines of railroad from a place in one State to a place in another State, the several lines thus operated together shall be treated, for all the purposes of this act, as one line; and each and every of such persons, companies, and corporations shall be bound by the provisions of this act, and liable for any violation thereof. And in all cases where several lines of railway are united or connected together, and engaged in carrying freight or passengers into or through two or more States, by a continuous route, whether under one management or not, it shall not be lawful for them, or any of them, to evade the operation of this act by any form of contract designed for that purpose; and it shall be competent in all suits brought under this act to show that the defendant was in fact, when the alleged extortion occurred, engaged in operating a part of a continuous line of interstate commerce; and upon such fact being made to appear, such defendant shall be held subject to the provisions of this act, whatever the character or form of the contract between such defendant and the shipper may have been.

SEC. 11. That it shall be the duty of said railroad commissioners to personally investigate and ascertain whether the provisions of this act are violated by any corporations, companies, or persons engaged in the business of transportation as aforesaid; and for the purpose of making such investigations, they shall have all the powers conferred upon them by section 5 of this act; and whenever the facts in any manner ascertained shall, in their judgment, warrant a prosecution, it shall be the duty of said commissioners to cause suit to be commenced and prosecuted against the offending party or parties, to recover the penalties provided by this act in such cases. And the several district attorneys shall, whenever informed in any way that this act has been violated, institute the necessary proceedings for enforcing the penalties herein provided. Suits brought under this act may be commenced in any district through or into which the line of the corporation, company, or person sued may extend; and service of process may be made upon any agent or officer of such corporation, company, or person within such district.

SEC. 12. That each and every provision of this act shall apply to lines of railroad within the Territories of the United States, and to all lines extending from a place in one of the States to a place within any one of such Territories, and to any and all corporations, companies, or persons engaged in the operation of any such lines, to the same extent and in the same manner as to such lines as may extend from a place in one State to a place in another State.

SEC. 13. That the railroad commissioners aforesaid shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, severally take and subscribe an oath or affirmation that they will honestly, faithfully, and impartially discharge the duties of said office; which oath shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. In case of voluntary collusion on the part of said commissioners, or either of them, with any railroad company or other party, to delay, defeat, or hinder the proper enforcement of this act, or willful negligence to perform any duties required thereby, proceedings shall be at once commenced by indictment, at the instance of the United States attorney for the proper district, in any circuit court of the United States where the offense may have been committed, for malfeasance in office, and on conviction of the same such person or persons so found guilty shall be fined not less than $10,000, nor more than $50,000, and shall in addition be sentenced to imprisonment for not less than three nor more than ten years, and be disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; and the court, in its discretion, may direct such person or persons so convicted to be imprisoned until such fine and costs be paid; and a lien is hereby declared in favor of the United States on all the real property of any commissioner so convicted from the day of the date of the return of the indictment into court.

SEC. 14. That in addition to the other duties of said board of railroad commissioners they shall open and keep, in the Department of the Interior, a bureau of railway statistics, and in this capacity they shall gather, collate, and annually report to Congress statistics and facts relating to commerce among the several States by railroad; to the railroad systems of this and other countries; to the construction and operation of railroads; and to the actual cost of such construction and operation, as well as to the actual cost of transportation of freight and passengers by railroad, and the profits realized by carriers. And they shall also inquire, and from time to time report to Congress, what, if any, further legislation by Congress is necessary for the just and reasonable regulation of such commerce, or for defining the rights and duties of persons engaged as common carriers on lines extending from State to State, for securing the safety and convenience of persons traveling thereby, or for the protection of immigrants traveling upon such lines. And for these purposes they shall have power to require returns to be made to them by all railroad companies, and by all persons and companies engaged in transportation by railroad. They shall also have power, through the Department of State or otherwise, to procure careful and authentic reports upon the railroad system in use in foreign countries. And in prosecuting their investigations under this section they shall have all the powers in relation to obtaining evidence and examining witnesses which are conferred by section five of this act. And if any railroad company or person, being required and notified by said board to make return to them of any facts or to answer any interrogatories concerning any of the matters about which said board is authorized to inquire, shall fail or refuse so to do for ninety days after the time fixed by said board for making such return, they shall forfeit and pay to the United States a penalty of not less than $5,000 for each offense, to be sued for and recovered as is hereinbefore provided in relation to other penalties.

SEC. 15. That all unjust discrimination in the matter of charges for carrying freight or passengers over or upon any such line of railroad as is herein described is hereby prohibited; and any corporation, company, or person, engaged in operating any such line of railroad who shall be guilty of any such unjust discrimination in making or collecting such charges, in favor of or against any person, firm, or company, or in favor of or against any particular place on the line, or at a terminus of such road, shall be subject to the same penalty as that provided in cases of extortion under this act; and such penalty shall be enforced in the same manner as in such cases of extortion; and the party injured by any such unjust discrimination shall have his action for damages in the same manner as in cases of extortion.

Mr. McCRARY. If the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] who is to speak next, would prefer to go on in the morning, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ARTHUR. I prefer to go on now.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 527) for the relief of Hanson Harmon; and

A bill (S. No. 449) granting a pension to Mrs. Amy A. Hough.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 2224) appropriating $1,400 to pay the operators in the departmental telegraph connected with the two Houses of Congress, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroad among the several States.

[Mr. ARTHUR addressed the House; but did not finish his remarks. His speech in full will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HURLBUT. The gentleman from Kentucky has not concluded his argument, but as he seems to be somewhat weary, if he will yield to me I will move the House adjourn.

Mr. ARTHUR. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move the House adjourn.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move, by unanimous consent, that the report of the Committee on Commerce in regard to the Louisville and Portland Canal bill, which has been made a special order for Monday next after the morning hour, be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES D. POSTELL.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Charles D. Postell, of the National Military Home, Dayton, Ohio, for relief, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

TICE METER.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of distillers of the third collection district of Illinois, praying that the money paid by distillers for the Tice meter be refunded; and the same was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before adjourning I hope we may come to some arrangement by which at least a portion of to-morrow's session will be given to the Committee on Appropriations for the consideration of the appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I very much desire to call up the legislative appropriation bill to-morrow.

Mr. HURLBUT. We can arrange that to-morrow.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HALE, of New York, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for two weeks.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following amendment to the rules; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Rules, and ordered to be printed:

Amend Rule 131 by adding thereto the following:
Committees may also file at the Clerk's desk such petitions as they may decide have been wrongfully referred to them, indorsing upon them the committees to which they should be referred, together with the names of the committees reporting them back.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. AVERILL: The petition of Edward P. Johnson, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CESSNA: The petition of citizens of Franklin County, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of that portion of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced the duties on certain commodities 10 per cent., to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of the New Garden Monthly Meeting of the Society of Friends, of Chester County, Pennsylvania, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of Edward Heinzel, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CROUNSE: Resolutions of the Merchants' Club of Omaha, Nebraska, asking transfer of the control of Indian affairs to the War Department, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia: The petition of William W. Morrow, late first lieutenant First Virginia Artillery, for payment for military services and for reimbursement of recruiting expenses, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DONNAN: A paper for the establishment of a post-route in Iowa, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of Harriet Tuttle, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

Also, the petition of citizens of Ohio, in relation to the eight-hour law, to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. HALE, of New York: The petition of Eliza Tolman, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia: The petition of citizens of Augusta County, Virginia, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which made a reduction of 10 per cent. in certain duties, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut: The petition of Thomas Belknap, Normand Lyman, and others, of Hartford, Connecticut, for the payment of the French spoliation claims, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of William Ballenger, of Drainesville, Virginia, to be paid for stores furnished the Union Army in 1862 and 1863, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HYDE: Papers for the establishment of post-routes from Lineville, Wayne County, Iowa, to Cairnsville, Harrison County, Missouri; from Cairnsville, Harrison County, Missouri, via Akron, to New Buda, Iowa; and from Princeton, Mercer County, Missouri, via Cairnsville and Eagleville, to Allendale, Worth County, Missouri, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. MAYNARD: The petition of Willis N. Arnold, of Mifflin, Tennessee, to be paid for services as scout and guide during the war, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McNULTA: Affidavit of Charles M. Foster, in the matter of the application of the Pekin Alcohol Manufacturing Company, for relief, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PURMAN: Resolutions of the Legislature of Florida, for an appropriation for a custom-house at Cedar Keys and a marine hospital at Sea Horse Key, Florida, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, the memorial of the Legislature of Florida, asking that the barracks at Saint Augustine be transferred to the State of Florida for a lunatic asylum, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Florida, for the establishment of mail-routes from Monticello, in Jefferson County, to Perry Court-House, in Taylor County; from Cedar Keys to Withlacoochee River, and thence to Paunasofka Lake; and from Brooksville to the head of Crystal River, all in Florida, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of S. A. Harvey, mother and guardian of the minor children of William E. Scherr, late captain Company E, Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers, for pensions to said minor children, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of Jacquelin M. Wood, of Lynchburgh, Virginia, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of Benjamin T. Tinsley, of Roanoke County, Virginia, to be reimbursed for cotton seized and destroyed by the United States forces at Columbus, Georgia, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STORM: The petition of tobacco manufacturers and dealers, for the abolition of the import duty on mass or stick licorice, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana: The petition of Hiram A. Benefield, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the speedy construction of a ship-canal around Niagara Falls; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, presented the petition of R. Johnston, administrator of A. Vasse, deceased, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BAYARD. I present a petition, which is printed and purports to have been signed by 38 national banks of the city of New York, by 34 trust companies of that city, by several life insurance and fire insurance companies, and by very nearly two hundred of the most eminent bankers and mercantile firms in that city, representing that they are greatly alarmed at the assumption by the Secretary of the Treasury of the right without warrant of law to issue new United States notes commonly known as greenbacks. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senate that he has received a similar paper, the petition itself and all the signatures being printed; and in such cases he has not deemed it his duty to lay them before the Senate, there being no way to identify the genuineness of the signatures.

Mr. SHERMAN. The original was presented by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand now that the original was presented yesterday; and it was upon the assurance that those signatures were verified that I undertook to present it now as an exposition of the feeling and opinion of those of our fellow-citizens who are best entitled to come to the correct conclusion on this subject from their experience and from their knowledge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be referred to the Committee on Finance, if there be no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens of Portland, Oregon, praying the passage of the bill granting aid in the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. HARVEY presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, in favor of Congress taking such steps immediately as will secure the settlement and payment of numerous claims now on file at Washington City, by citizens on the frontier, for loss by Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, requesting Congress to take immediate steps for the relief of certain homestead settlers and to make satisfactory arrangements with railroad companies having conflicting claims, whereby the settlers will be enabled to retain their homesteads and enjoy the blessings of their labor and their money expended in improving the same; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means in their power to procure the immediate adoption of such measures as will result in making certain Indian lands subject to taxation the same as all other lands in Kansas not owned exclusively by the United States Government; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the passage of a law extending the time of payment to the settlers upon the Sac and Fox diminished reserve; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Osage County, Kansas, settlers upon the Sac and Fox land of the diminished reserve, praying an extension of time within which to pay for the same; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the transfer of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the War Department; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Mary A. Holmes, of Columbia, South Carolina, praying compensation for fifty bales of cotton destroyed in Perry County, Alabama, in 1865, by United States troops, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John M. McPike, praying compensation for beef furnished to the Utah volunteers in 1860, and the bill (S. No. 354) for the relief of Jordan & McPike, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 563) for the relief of John M. McPike; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins, instruct me to report it back with a recommendation that it do not pass. A similar Senate bill was referred to the committee, upon which a report was made some time ago adversely by a majority of the committee, a minority dissenting from the report of the majority, and this House bill is reported back in the same manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1581) for the relief of George S. Wright, administrator of the estate of John T. Wright, deceased, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to examine and report "whether, in their judgment, any obligation rests upon the United States to reimburse the several States and Territories, and the citizens thereof, for expenses incurred and damages sustained by reason of the incursions of hostile Indians, and if such obligation exists, whether any legislation looking to such reimbursement is practical and expedient," submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Hon. D. C. Leach and R. Goodrich, and 94 others, praying Congress to provide means by which certain parties named may obtain patents for their lands or be indemnified for means expended, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 200) for the relief of settlers on the Cherokee strip in Kansas, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 668) relative to private contracts or agreements made with the Indians prior to May 21, 1872, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 505) to amend an act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes, approved July 29, 1848, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1575) for the relief of Richard H. Swift, former assessor of the fourth internal-revenue district in the State of Alabama, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 564) for the relief of Mrs. Emma A. Porch; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McCREERY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 565) for the relief of Alexander M. Mayo; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2330) to extend the provisions of section 21 of chapter 200 of the acts passed at the second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, giving to unnaturalized persons enlisting in the naval service or Marine Corps of the United States the same rights as are now given by law to such persons enlisted in the Army of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 225) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," approved July 1, 1870, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HAYDEN'S CRETACEOUS FLORA OF THE WEST.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound twenty-five hundred copies in quarto (uniform with the series) of Professor Hayden's report on the Cretaceous Flora of the West—one thousand copies for the Department of the Interior, one thousand copies for the Smithsonian Institution, and five hundred copies for the office of the United States Geological Survey of the Territories.

Mr. SHERMAN. That resolution I presume should be referred to the Committee on Printing, but before it is referred I desire to say that it comes within the principle of the case decided already by the Senate, and I hope the Senate will stand by that position. Why should we print this expensive folio volume and give it to the Departments, when we know that if it is distributed by the Departments it will be at an expense of not less than a dollar a volume, to be paid by the Government of the United States? I certainly shall not vote for any such proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

TRANSPORTATION FROM WEST TO EAST.

Mr. RAMSEY. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board be instructed to consider and report upon the expediency of improving water and railway communications from the Mississippi Valley to the sea-board, and to regulate commerce among the States by cheapening transportation between the East and West, by improving the navigation of the Mississippi River from its source to the Gulf of Mexico, and the lake navigation from Lake Superior to Lake Ontario; and by chartering a double-track freight railroad from the Missouri River to the ocean at the low maximum rate of six mills a ton a mile.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator doubtless knows, by conference with his colleague, the chairman of the committee, that he has no objection to this resolution.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no information from my colleague on the subject.

Mr. CONKLING. I rose to suggest that it might be well to allow this resolution to lie over until the other Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] comes in. He may want to suggest some amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well. My desire was to have it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. THURMAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the joint select committee to investigate the proceedings of the government of the District of Columbia have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

A similar resolution has passed the House, and it is necessary that one should pass the Senate to give the authority.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LIQUOR-TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, the pending question being upon the amendment of Mr. BAYARD to the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance as amended by the Senate.

The amendment to the amendment of the committee, as amended, was in section 2, line 2, after the word "salary," to insert "all of whom shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation or total abstinence, in relation to alcoholic or fermented liquors."

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the Senate will not adopt this amendment. The language of the bill is already sufficient, as it seems to me, to cover every possible case. By reference to the language of the bill itself it will be seen that no person is excluded. There is nothing in the bill itself that contemplates that persons in favor of prohibition shall be appointed on this commission any more than that those who are opposed to prohibition shall be appointed. It seems to me it would be quite as just and quite as proper to provide that no minister, no lawyer, no physician, should be appointed on this commission as to put in this provision that is offered by the Senator from Delaware. As the bill stands, the kind of persons to be appointed on this commission, general in description, is pointed out; and now it is proposed to provide that the commission shall not be made up entirely of a particular class of persons. It is not proposed by the friends of the bill that the commission shall be thus made up. The language of the bill is such that persons on either side and all sides of this question can be appointed; and it seems to me, coming, as this amendment does, from a Senator who is opposed to the bill under all circumstances and is not disposed to vote for it, the friends of the measure should not favor this amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. There is nothing in the amendment offered which militates against what, I trust, is the intent of the measure. The professed intent of the measure is the procuration of reliable statistics on an exceedingly important subject. It is a subject in regard to which the most radical differences of opinion exist among men; and we should be very blind to the condition of public sentiment on this subject if we did not know that both sides of opinions should have representation upon this proposed commission. I do not propose that this commission shall be placed in the hands of men of preconceived views and opinions against it, but simply ask that all of those who are concerned in procuring this testimony and returning their opinions, by way of report, to Congress or to the President, (I forget the terms of the bill in that respect,) should not be committed to certain well-known views. The Senator from Iowa, it is not improper for me to remark, and myself, might be taken as representative men of these two classes of opinions; he approving of the system of coercive legislation in regard to these things, and I totally disapproving; yet both of us, I trust, are equally admirers of temperance, whether applied to alcoholic drinks or to anything else.

Now what reasonable objection there can be to allowing this commission to be composed of men of equally high character and intelligence, but of variant opinions as to this general policy discussed, I cannot see. If it be the intention to confine this commission and its action to partisans—and I use the word "partisan" in no offensive sense—to gentlemen of biased and preconceived opinions on this subject, so that the color of their views shall run through the report which they shall make to Congress, then, I simply say, you will not have a proper basis either for public opinion or for public law.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that passing this amendment is really giving a partisan character to the commission. That is the trouble with it. It is selecting out persons of peculiar views, who are in favor of the liquor traffic, to put on this commission. Now the bill, as I understand it, leaves it to the President untrammeled, without direction, and, as I understand, it also provides that these commissioners are to be appointed by the advice and consent of the Senate, so that we shall have abundant opportunity to see that the commission is a fair one.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to add to what I have already said, that this bill, as now framed, provides that these persons shall be selected "solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation." That is the general provision of the bill with reference to the qualification of these persons. It seems to me that the language of the amendment is entirely superfluous, and tends to tie the hands of the appointing power and the hands of the Senate upon this subject, and quite unnecessarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 21, noes 20.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. As the yeas and nays are to be taken, I desire to say one word. It does seem to me that this amendment is unusual. I know not if any such limitation has ever been before suggested with regard to the appointing power. This is to go forward and say to the President that he is to find these commissioners out of a certain class of people, or at least one or more of the commissioners out of a certain class. No such language can be found in any statute with reference to any other appointment to be made by the President. It is here original, and for the first time introduced. Why? I can discover no other reason than to embarrass the inquiry; and precisely because it is to embarrass the inquiry, I am against it.

I think that this inquiry should be undertaken in good faith, and that Congress should arm the President with all proper power to institute this commission without limitation; without any new propositions, any new suggestions which shall curtail the power that the President habitually exercises under the Constitution when he appoints to office. It will be for him to look over the country and find the proper men, whether they incline one way or another way. It is in his discretion, and that discretion is afterward to be ratified by the Senate. Sir, that is enough.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, after hearing the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, whose sincerity in behalf of this measure is not doubted, I am led to suspect that I have mistaken the meaning and effect of this amendment; and, therefore, as it is very brief, I beg that it be again reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, after the word "salary," in the second section, second line, the words, "all of whom shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation or total abstinence in relation to alcoholic or fermented liquors."

Mr. CONKLING. The thought which that amendment suggests to my mind is this, or would be this had I not heard the Senator from Massachusetts disapprove it, and had I not seen other Senators vote against it: Here is authority to institute and conduct an inquiry; and it is to be conducted by men who are to receive no compensation for their services. I call attention to the want of compensation to remind Senators that the selection of commissioners does not fall within the general rule prevailing in such cases. Why? Because generally you would seek for persons wholly impartial, wholly disinterested, not prepossessed of any theory, if you were going to make search for absolute, abstract truth on both sides. That, under this bill, you cannot have. Why? Because if you are going to ask competent citizens, business and educated men, whose capacity is such as to warrant their selection, to execute the proposed inquiry for nothing, you must, of course, go among those who feel a sufficient interest in the subject to induce them to contribute this much of their time and of their labor. Therefore I will assume that the President, if he finds men who will act for nothing, must select those who, on the one side or the other of the chief question concerned, feel some special interest in it, or solicitude about it.

Again, I am reminded that the inspiration of this inquiry is from strict temperance men. It is that circumstance, among others, which gives it the respect I feel for it. It is inspired and prompted by those profoundly impressed with the misery and evil flowing from the excessive use of intoxicating drinks. Thus naturally, here and with the President and in the public understanding, this proceeding takes the color of a total abstinence inquiry, and the bill is already tatooed with amendments showing this to be the general and accepted understanding. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] objected to it on constitutional grounds, and because, as he saw it, it looked to nothing but temperance legislation by Congress; and in answer to that Senators said, I being myself one of them, "Why, no; this is not to be a one-idea proceeding, and does not presuppose legislation by Federal authority upon the question of the use in States of intoxicating drinks. The information, it was argued, may be useful for many purposes of legislation—for revenue legislation, for legislation touching many other things easily to be suggested, all clearly within our province." The Senator from Delaware offered an amendment directing that the inquiry should be pointed in the direction of information valuable for legislation touching revenue, and I believe his amendment was adopted without a division of the Senate. All of these amendments show that in the inception of this movement its idea was a strict temperance inquiry, with a special view, and it has been enlarged in order to amplify and change it somewhat in that regard.

With this start, in general understanding, of the nature and object of the inquiry, what is the best way to make up the commission? Do the discreet friends of the bill want a partisan, one-sided investigation, which will enable everybody to say that there was an exclusion of all adverse views? Is that the way the tribunal should be constituted? Should any tribunal be so constituted, be it a jury, a parliamentary body, a court, or any other group of men to which an inquiry is to be submitted, whose judgment should carry conviction to the public mind—should it be wholly one-sided, of men prepossessed on one side? Could we provide a broad field of selection, by paying for the service, the choice should be of those not prepossessed at all; but, as I have already said, that is not attainable in this case, because, the service being gratuitous, you must have those so interested in and related to the subject, that their interest will prompt them to give their time and attention to it. What then is the next best thing? Why, to have both sides represented; and now I understand this amendment to provide in effect that of these five commissioners there shall be at least one not known as an advocate of prohibitory legislation or of total abstinence.

Can any Senator doubt, can any temperance man, however devoted he may be, doubt that if value is to attach to the report of this commission, to even the statistics and data to be gathered, still more to the judgment the commissioners pronounce, that value will be greatly enhanced by the presence on the commission of one man who it might be supposed had bias and partisanship enough the other way to ask questions, and to introduce any document, fact, or evidence to qualify or add to the residue of the report? There can be no doubt of this; and therefore I had supposed, as I heard the amendment read, that in place of being calculated to hamper the President, and embarrass or prevent this investigation, or to do anything in derogation of it, it was an amendment likely to disarm the prejudice and resentful feeling which might carp at the action of Congress, as a raid, with doubtful powers, upon certain opinions and certain property.

It seemed to me the effect of it would be to give the appearance of fairness, of impartiality, to this investigation, and I confess if left to my own judgment, without the opportunity to inquire, I should have said that those who have most promoted the investigation, were the question asked of them, would say, "Certainly, we want no false report; we want no report which will look one-sided and prejudiced; we want no commission so constituted as to put into the hands of the enemies of temperance a weapon with which to weaken the effect of what it may say or do." That would have been my idea; but, as I said, I am led to suppose that I must be wrong, because Senators in whose judgment much more confidence may be reposed than in mine seem to disapprove of it. Surely there must be considerations which have wholly escaped me.

One word as to hampering the President. We have not been special in solicitude about violating the Constitution by controlling the President; and for a Senate which has voted for the civil-service rules, which rules, in case of the appointments referred to, virtually restrict the selection to three men, to balk at the pending amendment seems to me straining at a gnat after swallowing a camel. It is clearly competent for Congress to say, in creating a commission, that one member of the commission shall be a lawyer, or that one member of the commission shall be skilled in a particular art, or that one member of the commission shall not be a representative of a particular class of opinions with regard to the subject-matter. Can any doubt this? It seems to me the objection here is a refinement upon sophistry, in view of enactments for which, by large majorities, the Senate has often voted. I have no difficulty with the Constitution.

Now as to the suggestion that it will in fact hamper the President, would it not be convenient for the President to know, is it not fair that we shall enable the President to know, whether by this inquiry and the commission to conduct it we mean a proceeding in the interest in all respects of one class of opinions, or whether we mean an inquiry to be conducted to the end and to all the ends, wherever the truth may lead—by "the truth" meaning not only such facts as bear upon the particular view in which it might be supposed we are legislating, but such facts as bear upon all other views pertinent to the subject? It seems to me it would be not only usual and ordinary, but convenient, and as I say fair, to apprise the appointing power what is the nature of the investigation we propose. If we want him to select some man eminent in statistics to present the statistical view, it would be right to say so. If we mean that he is to select five gentlemen conspicuous as philanthropists in order to present the moral, social, and religious aspects of this evil with its illustrations, I think it would be quite right that the bill should so indicate. This amendment presents fairly the question what we do mean, and unless there is something about it which does not occur to me, so far from embarrassing the inquiry, its tendency and effect would seem to be to lift it up in public respect and free it from the criticisms and assaults of those who might say this is a mere one-sided, partisan, fanatical affair from which we are excluded, and everybody else who could tell the other side of this story was excluded.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it is very natural that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts should criticise the language of my amendment, and, in his well-known confidence in the discretion of the appointing power, take exception to the qualifications that I sought to impose upon the commissioners proposed by this act. But in his anxiety to profess and exhibit his confidence in the Executive, he surely forgot that there are many classes of appointments wherein the qualifications of the official are referred to. The Constitution itself does say, I think, in providing for the nomination and appointment of judges of the Supreme Court of the United States that they shall be persons learned in the law. In almost every election law, not only those which have been passed, as I think improperly, by Congress, but those which have been properly passed by the States, inspectors of election and officers otherwise connected with the election, are mentioned by law as belonging one to each of the several parties, it being always presumed that there are two sides to every election, and two parties to represent them. How often in the selection of juries, in the very nature of things, is the word "impartial" insisted upon? I have been accustomed to practice law under statutes which require the performance of very high discretionary duties only by impartial freeholders.

Now, the result of the amendment that I offered, and which has been very well stated by the Senator from New York, is simply that in providing this commission there shall be mixed opinion on the subject to which it relates in the minds of those who are to have the power of collecting the information and reporting it to Congress. There is nothing novel, I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts, either in the nature of the proposition or in its language. There is abundant precedent for it, and there is abundant reason for it, and I have heard no reason yet which strikes my mind as being sufficient for its rejection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, this is a proposition, in a general way, to create a commission to consider the effect of the traffic in, and the manufacture of, ardent spirits upon the morals and the economic and social relations of the American people. I assume that is what it means. Undoubtedly it is idle to disguise the fact that it is moved in the interest of a class of people who take a deep concern in the question of temperance, in promoting temperance and sobriety, public and private. But in the consideration of any questions of this kind, I suppose all aims, and objects, and pursuits, would be directed to the general purpose of promoting temperance. It is an entirety; it cannot be divided; there is but one side to such a proposition. Everybody here and everywhere else believes in temperance; and whatever investigation you make, whether public or private, it will be to the end of promoting among the American people the cause of temperance, both public and private sobriety. You cannot divide it by any other line. There is in this Chamber, there is out of it, nowhere any man, woman, or child who has come to years of discretion who does not commend temperance.

It is true, when we come to consider the question of the promotion of temperance as a general cause or as affecting individuals, we disagree widely as to the best methods of promoting that very general subject.

Some will say that it must be remitted to the domain of morals wholly and entirely, and that any attempt to correct either the traffic in ardent spirits or the use of ardent spirits outside of that will in the end prove futile. Perhaps it has not been stated quite as broadly as that this morning or in this debate; but that is a somewhat general impression that lies in the public mind, that this is one of those social evils which must be remitted to the domain of morals for its reformation.

Then public sentiment divides again when you come to the question of legislation and the methods which are pursued in the country between the principle of prohibiting the traffic in alcoholic drinks as a beverage absolutely and licensing it.

Then it is idle to say that there is not another question which lies very near the object of this investigation, and that is the participation which the Government itself has in the manufacture of and traffic in intoxicating drinks by the revenues it gathers annually from their manufacture and sale.

On the whole, Mr. President, it will be seen that while everybody will desire that this investigation shall redound to the promotion of the cause of temperance as a general proposition, it is desirable, as the Senator from New York has stated, I think, that all sides of the question should be fairly presented; in other words, that all methods for the attainment of this general object, popular sobriety, all the methods leading to the accomplishment of that general end, shall be examined into carefully. Those who believe that it can best be attained by moral suasion should have an opportunity for an expression; those who believe that prohibition as a principle of legislation is sound, prohibiting the traffic in alcoholic drinks as a beverage, should have an opportunity to furnish the facts and exhibit the statistics, and spread before the American people the arguments and the illustrations. A believer in that myself, I should be glad to challenge the sharpest investigation, the most thorough proof in regard to the whole subject. Those who believe that it can be demonstrated that the wiser policy is to license this traffic under certain limitations and conditions should also have an opportunity for the largest collection of facts and arguments that may be prepared on that general subject.

Therefore, Mr. President, while I favor the largest investigation on this whole subject, while I believe that no more important subject can be brought to the attention of the American people, and while I do not question the authority of Congress over this subject because of its relation to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks in the country, and to the end that it may affect the legislation on that subject, I am in favor of the most ample opportunity to all sides to express their views. I therefore hope that my honorable friend who has charge of this bill will not deem it at all hostile or detrimental to this general subject and to the general purpose of this measure that the amendment of the Senator from Delaware shall be ingrafted upon it.

Mr. HOWE. I am not going to debate the question. I did desire to say a few words in opposition to this amendment; but the hour of one is at hand, and I do not wish to be the cause of postponing the further consideration of this measure to another day, and therefore I will forbear to say anything, but ask for a vote of the Senate, which I know my friend from Iowa who has charge of the bill very much desires; first upon the pending amendment, and then upon the bill itself; and I think we can get it out of the way.

Mr. CARPENTER. Simply in explanation of the vote I shall give in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, I desire to say that I understand this to be a movement looking to future legislation in this body; and the report of the commission will have far greater weight, far greater influence, on the side of this question which the Senators offering this bill have in view and at heart if the commission is not made up all on one side. Our rule here in fixing committees on all important questions, on all political questions, is to put at least one democrat on a committee. The same thing ought to be done here. The commission should not be made up exclusively of any one class, but both sides should be represented, and in that way the report will have five times the influence that it will if it is understood to be a report made entirely by those on one side.

Mr. HOWE. Now I hope that one o'clock will not come for five minutes, that I may say two words in justification of the vote that I propose to give against the pending amendment.

Mr. President, if you want to have an investigation conducted by a balanced committee, by a committee which does not mean to work to any end, this amendment will not secure such a committee, because you must then command the President to appoint at least some who are in favor of temperance, as well as to do what the pending amendment proposes—command him to appoint some who are not in favor of temperance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The hour of one o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, the centennial bill, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. CARPENTER. I gave notice the other day of a desire to call up the bill which I introduced for a new election in Louisiana, for the purpose of submitting some brief remarks on that bill. If it is the pleasure of the Senate, I should like to be heard on that subject now, and I will ask that the pending order be laid aside informally for that purpose.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose my colleague does not mean to insist on that just at this moment.

Mr. CARPENTER. I insist on nothing; but I understood the Chair to state that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. HOWE. The morning hour I suppose has expired, and the question is whether I shall have three minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] asks unanimous consent to proceed with his remarks on Senate bill No. 161, and that the unfinished business be laid aside informally for that purpose. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOWE. There are simply two ideas that I wish to express. The first is that you cannot, by agreeing to this amendment, be sure of getting a committee which represents two parties or represents two sides to any given or namable controversy. That is one objection which I have to this amendment. The other objection I have to it is more radical, more fundamental. It is that I know of but one side to any controversy that can be predicated or can be predicted as growing out of the bill before the Senate.

Mr. President, this investigation, conducted by whom it may be, will have one of two ends in view: either to show to the national Legislature that it can do something to restrain and restrict the manufacture and the sale of intoxicating drinks, or that it can do something to promote the manufacture and the use of intoxicating drinks. If the last be the end proposed for the investigation, I do not wish to aid it; it needs no aid. I supposed the first was the end proposed by the investigation; that we were to have an inquiry in order to show to the Legislature that it could, within the sphere prescribed to its action by the Constitution, do something to restrict the use or the abuse of alcoholic beverages. If that can be shown to us, I am willing to have the inquiry. I want to see what it is. Anybody who can teach us that great lesson will do the public a service; but unless an investigation can teach us that, I do not want to learn anything from an inquiry of the sort. I take it that is the only lesson we need.

For these two reasons I hope this amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask permission of my friend behind me [Mr. CARPENTER] to occupy a moment in reply to my honorable friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] During a somewhat active practice of law for twenty years, and a somewhat varied life, I have learned, I hope thoroughly, a good deal of the evils coming from the use of intoxicating drinks, and I believe with sincerity I may contest with any member of this body a claim to primacy in an earnest wish to do anything I may to mitigate that evil. I assure my honorable friend from Wisconsin that I am quite as honest, quite as earnest, as he can be in this regard; and now I make one prediction, or if it shall not deserve the name of prediction one guess, in regard to this matter.

An amendment has been offered to give one man in five of the triers to one side of this question, in place of having all five on one side; and I thank my friend for interjecting his question, "What question?" The question whether by the compulsion of law, whether by the hand of State or municipal police, you can enforce what are termed sumptuary laws; whether, although the jaws of the sons of all New England ache with chewing tobacco to-day, the best way to put an end to the use of tobacco is by law to enact that they shall not chew? Turning to another branch of the question, I say it is this: Whether total abstinence from everything that can intoxicate, be it distilled spirits, malt liquors, or the light wines of the Rhine or France, or of California, Missouri, and New York; whether total abstinence from the use, on any occasion, as a beverage, of all that can intoxicate is, or is not, a permanent and absolute truth in social economy?

The Senator from Wisconsin has his opinion upon both these questions. I have my impression at least; but I speak of them both in answer to his inquiry what question do I mean when I speak of sides to a question here.

Now I return to the guess I rose to make. I have said, speaking of these questions, we are about to inquire in reference to them. Those who hold views on one side, it is proposed by the Senator from Delaware, shall have one in five of the committee to investigate. My guess is that if the Senate votes down that amendment and declares upon the record that it means a wholly partial, prejudiced, one-sided inquisition, under the name of an inquiry, it will do more to embarrass, defeat and destroy the value of this investigation than it could by any other vote it might give. I venture to say that, in answer to my friend. He will live to know how it is. If I do I will acknowledge my error with as much grace as I may, if it turns out that I am mistaken. I do not believe the friends of this inquiry can afford that. Had not the amendment been offered, had the bill passed without reference to that point, it would be a different case; but when it is proposed to allow one man in five to be on one side of the question to be tried, I do not believe you can afford to say you will not grant as much as that.

Mr. HOWE. I was true to the contract I made; I did not occupy more than three minutes——

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I hope the Senator will be permitted to go on, and that we shall get a vote on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate proceeds by unanimous consent, subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. HOWE. But the three minutes have involved me in a seeming necessity for asking for three or five minutes more; and that I may spend as few minutes as possible, I beg to be indulged with one more reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. BAYARD.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend from Wisconsin allow me to suggest to him that this matter cannot be disposed of this morning, and that his colleague [Mr. CARPENTER] has permission of the Senate to be heard at one o'clock to-day, and is prepared to go on upon another and very interesting subject. As this bill cannot be disposed of to-day, would it not be better to allow his colleague to proceed with the speech of which he has given notice?

Mr. HOWE. I was in hopes that this matter could be disposed of to-day.

Mr. THURMAN. It cannot be. It is impossible.

Mr. HOWE. There I am confronted with another prediction. I shall not insist if it is going to embarrass my colleague or the Senate to hear me five minutes this morning. I thought this bill could be disposed of. I knew I could be disposed of in a very few minutes if I could be indulged, but if anybody else is going to be embarrassed by it I certainly shall not persist, especially if my colleague——

Mr. THURMAN. I know of other amendments to be offered to the bill that will produce debate.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; I will yield the floor.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] will not insist on his motion, but will allow us to finish the centennial bill. I have some strong reasons for making this request. Several Senators are not here who would vote on the side on which I shall vote. Then I have some personal reasons. I cannot leave the Senate while that bill is pending. It has become so much a Pennsylvania question that I should be deemed neglectful, in the estimation of my best friends, if I were to leave it. This moment I have received a telegram from home announcing to me the death of a child of one of my dearest friends; the first-born son of a man I love as if he were my own son; and I feel it my duty to go there and mingle my tears with his; and nothing would prevent me from going except this higher duty which I owe to the State of Pennsylvania, to which State I owe all I have.

It may seem a weakness in me to talk about going to the funeral of a boy ten or twelve years old, a hundred and fifty miles away, and perhaps it would be were I a young man; but when one has his foot upon the line which divides time from eternity he begins to look back upon all that belongs to home and its endearments; he begins to remember those to whom he owes everything that he has acquired; he begins to feel that there are higher duties than any which belong to self. I know that the parents of this child will be in deep distress, and I am anxious to go there. I think the Senator from Wisconsin, when I appeal to his heart, will allow us to finish this bill without any interruption, and I trust that the Senate, especially the young men who are full of joy and goodness, and Senators who approach my age, will vote to allow us to bring up this bill and end it now, so that I may go and see my friends in their deep distress, their irreparable loss.

Mr. CARPENTER. It was my purpose to make a speech against the centennial bill. Now, I make this proposition to my friend from Pennsylvania, that if he will give me the time to speak on the Louisiana bill, I will omit the speech against the centennial bill, and he will therefore lose no time in passing that bill. I make that as a proposition to him.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, this is one of those subjects on which I can make no bargain. I trust we shall go on with the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition is before the Senate. The Chair understands that the Senator from Wisconsin moves to postpone it.

Mr. CARPENTER. If such is the sense of the Senate, I will make that motion. I do not want to crowd myself on the Senate out of courtesy to me, and I do not want to be discourteous to the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not mean to occupy over an hour, and I prefer to do it now.

Mr. THURMAN. By unanimous consent the pending order can be passed over informally and the Senator allowed to proceed, and then the centennial bill keeps its place.

Mr. WEST. As I understand, the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to call up a bill that now lies on the Secretary's desk, for the purpose of submitting some remarks to the Senate on that bill. Is that the proposition?

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. I would inquire of the Senator whether he proposes to follow up his remarks with a proposition to refer that bill to a committee or not?

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand the Senator from Louisiana desires to speak on it. I certainly shall not be discourteous to him by making a motion that would cut off any remarks he might desire to make. The Senator can trust me on that point.

Mr. WEST. You will not press me?

Mr. CARPENTER. I will not press anything discourteous to you in time, place, or circumstance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to lay aside the pending bill informally. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMERON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made; and it is now moved that the pending and all prior orders be postponed, with the view of taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana.

[Mr. CARPENTER addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have some remarks to submit on this question.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust the Senator from New Jersey will not prevent me now from getting up the centennial bill. I made an appeal this morning to the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] He said he would occupy only an hour, and he would not listen to my appeal. It was the first time in my long service that such an appeal was not granted. Now I ask the Senate to take up the centennial bill. I desire to have that bill settled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the present bill and all other orders be postponed for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the centennial bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish the Senator from Pennsylvania would not make that motion just now. It is obvious that the centennial bill cannot be finally voted on this afternoon. There are several Senators who intend to speak on that bill, some of whom are here and some of whom are not, and we cannot get a vote. Probably we can get through it to-morrow, whether we begin it now or not. I should like very much, if it were the pleasure of the Senate, to be allowed to make some observations—I shall not be more than fifteen or twenty minutes at the outside—on the bill which is now under consideration. I should be glad if the Senator from Pennsylvania would see his way clear and let us have half an hour on this bill before he presses his centennial bill, and then he can take it up and make it the unfinished business, and we can go on with it to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON. There is no man in this Senate for whom I have a greater respect than the Senator from Ohio, for we have known each other for more than thirty years. I have never refused any appeal made to my feelings. I am desirous of leaving here at the earliest moment. If we take up the centennial bill now and pursue it until to-morrow night, or the next morning, I shall be enabled to go to the place of which I spoke this morning by Friday; but unless we take it up now that cannot be. I trust there will be no more difficulty about it, especially as the Senator from Wisconsin said this morning that he would not interfere after he had made his speech. He said also that he would not occupy more than an hour. I ask the Senate now, in a spirit of kindness to myself, (and I would not do that if the speech of the Senator from Ohio would lose its effect by this postponement) to go on with the centennial bill and pursue it until it is ended, if it can be by to-morrow or the day after.

Mr. CONKLING. Am I right in supposing that the Senator from New Jersey has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor, but has yielded.

Mr. CONKLING. He has yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I am very clear that the Senator from Pennsylvania ought to be indulged. He makes an appeal to the Senate which, fortunately, it is never necessary very often in life for any one to make. He wants to go away in consequence of a death which, under the circumstances, comes near to him. It seems to me that unless that request is countervailed by some other similar consideration, as if the Senator from Ohio were called away upon a like errand and wanted to be heard before he went, it should prevail; and if the Senator from New Jersey, who has the floor, yields, I do not see how the rest of us can justify ourselves in refusing to unite with him in his effort to oblige the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania expects to leave this afternoon.

Mr. CAMERON. No.

Mr. CONKLING. But I understand that he would leave this afternoon if he could. He will leave now as soon as he can without subjecting himself to the charge of desertion in respect to the centennial bill; and the Senator from Ohio does not need me to tell him that the sooner the Senator from Pennsylvania gets up his centennial bill the sooner he will have it concluded. Certainly nobody could argue candidly that by postponing his bill until to-morrow he will hasten the time when its termination will occur.

Mr. THURMAN. I must say, very candidly, that if he would allow half an hour more to the bill now under consideration, and then take up the centennial bill, so that it shall be left as the unfinished business, he will get through with it to-morrow, if he can get through with it to-morrow at all, just as well as if we should proceed to consider it right now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone the present bill and all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the centennial bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1760) to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1760) to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer this bill to the Committee on Appropriations, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. I understood that the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from New Jersey, neither of whom was in his seat at the time the motion was agreed to, desired to speak on the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. If he does not claim the floor, why cannot we take the vote?

Mr. THURMAN. There is something more to be said on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is now recognized.

Mr. THURMAN. I had not expected to say a word on this bill to-night; but as the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who is entitled to the floor, prefers not to speak now, and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] also prefers that I should say what I have to say at this time, I shall do so very briefly.

I am opposed to a reference of this bill, after what was said by my colleague, who made that motion. He announced frankly and without reserve that his object in making the motion was to send the bill to the Committee on Appropriations in order that they might report an appropriation. A vote, therefore, to send the bill to that committee is a vote in favor of an appropriation. It might as well be understood first as last that if you send it to that committee, you send it there in order that they may report an appropriation; and when it comes back with the appropriation the only question will be whether the appropriation is large enough, or whether it is too large. Now, as I am opposed to any appropriation at all, either for an international exposition or for a national celebration, I cannot vote to send this bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

I say that I am opposed to any appropriation at all, either for the one purpose or for the other—not that I am opposed to a national celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of American independence; not that I would not vote for an appropriation for that purpose, if I believed that we had the constitutional power to make it; but it is because I do not believe that we have any such constitutional power, that I cannot vote for any such appropriation.

Now, in the first place, with respect to the constitutional power, what Senator on this floor has pointed to one line or one letter of the Constitution that authorizes any such appropriation? My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania who sits nearest to me, [Mr. SCOTT,] than whom there is no man in the Senate better qualified to answer such a proposition if it could be successfully answered, when appealed to to point to that provision in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to give money for any such purpose, was compelled to answer simply by saying the thing had been done before, or things equally without warrant. No man has ventured to point to any such provision, and I imagine that the only provision which can be pointed to is the very well-known clause in regard to the power of Congress to levy taxes. Now let us see what that is. The first clause of section 8 of the first article of the Constitution reads:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

I need not say to every lawyer in the Senate that these words, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," are not construed now by any lawyer anywhere to be a distinct and substantive grant of power. It is very true that the Senator from Texas [Mr. FLANAGAN] the other day treated it as a substantive and independent grant of power, and thought that the Constitution gives us power to provide for the general welfare of the United States, just precisely as we may see fit to provide for it. I need not say to those who are somewhat more familiar with this subject that that interpretation of the Constitution would wipe out all the rest of it and every limitation of power whatsoever that is contained in it, and that it would be useless to talk of a strict construction or a latitudinarian construction, if there were in the Constitution a distinct, substantive, independent grant of power to the Congress of the United States to do whatever in its discretion would promote the general welfare of the United States. No, sir; the history of that clause and its meaning is well understood—not that it is not capable of different interpretations. The interpretation that has obtained more generally than any other is that suggested first, I believe, by Mr. Madison, and adopted by Judge Story in his Commentaries, to insert after the word "excises" the words "in order;" so that the clause should be read as if it were thus: "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." That is the interpretation which perhaps has the greatest weight of opinion in its support.

An interpretation, I know, has been contended for that is almost as bad as that other interpretation contended for by the Senator from Texas the other day, which makes the clause "to provide for the general welfare" a distinct, substantive, and independent grant of power, for it is said that you may levy "taxes, duties, imposts, and excises in order to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare of the United States," that is that your power to raise taxes is only limited by the general welfare, and that for any purpose that Congress in its discretion deems to be promotive of the general welfare, Congress may levy taxes; and if it may levy taxes for such purposes, of course it can expend them for such purposes. That is the argument. Therefore no matter what it is, if Congress shall suppose that it is "for the general welfare of the United States" to set up a particular government in the Sandwich Islands, or to establish schools in China or Japan to educate those people because they have intercourse with us, if Congress should deem that that would be for "the general welfare of the United States," it could levy taxes for that object, and having levied them it could expend them for that purpose. That is the argument upon which many an appropriation that, in my judgment, is entirely violative of the spirit, if not the very text, of the Constitution has been supported, and upon which alone, so far as I can see, must this appropriation be supported if it can be supported at all.

But, sir, is it true that Congress has a right to levy taxes for any purpose whatsoever, that in its discretion it may consider may be promotive of the public welfare? I deny the proposition. Congress has a right to promote the general welfare, as it has a right to provide for the common defense; but here is the rule, a rule that ought to be as inflexible as the laws of the Medes and Persians, that you can only provide for the general welfare by exercising the powers that are delegated to you in the Constitution. That is the mode in which you are to provide for the general welfare; not by going outside of the express delegations of power and roaming through all the universe of things to find something that in your judgment would be promotive of the general welfare. You can promote the general welfare by the exercise of the powers expressly conferred upon you and such as necessarily result by implication from those express grants; but you cannot go outside of that and treat these words, "to promote the general welfare," as a substantive, distinct grant of power. You can do that no more under the guise of the taxing power, than you could do it if that clause was wholly distinct from the clause of taxation. That, therefore, is my objection to this.

Sir, I make no cheap boast of patriotism or of sentiment about the celebration of the 4th of July. I feel it as deeply as those who speak loudest about it. I have no rhetorical phrases to utter upon that subject. I should scorn myself if I thought it necessary to utter any rhetoric to prove my devotion to free institutions, or my admiration of the most memorable day in the history of this world. I have nothing of that kind to do, and I say that I would, if I had the power, grant aid in a great national commemoration of the Sabbath-day of American freedom and of American independence at Philadelphia. It is simply because I have not that power that I will not give that aid. That is my first objection to sending this bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Then I am opposed to the idea upon which the legislation of Congress on this subject has heretofore gone, all which legislation I voted against, and upon which this bill goes—the idea of an international exposition in conjunction with the celebration of American independence. Why, sir, two more incongruous things could hardly be conceived; it is not necessary for me to go over that ground. They are plainly and manifestly incongruous. I do not say that necessarily our celebration of national independence will exclude foreigners; and it is not simply a celebration of national independence, for he takes but a very short-sighted view of the 4th day of July, 1776, who thinks that that was simply the inauguration of American independence; it was the inauguration of something more precious than American independence—it was the inauguration of free government on this earth, a thing more important than the independence of these Colonies from British rule. Yet I do not say that a skillful and adroit man, with great good taste and judgment, might not deliver an oration on the 4th of July, 1876, in the presence of all the representatives of royalty throughout the world, nay, even in the presence of all royalty itself if it should be there, that would not offend the just sensibilities of any man; but I do say that such an oration would not be the kind of literature that the American people have been accustomed to hear on the 4th day of July; not the kind of celebration that John Adams foretold, or was supposed by Webster to have foretold, would be resorted to on the birthday of American freedom—not that ringing of bells, not that lighting of the bonfires, not that shout of the multitude, not those burning words of freedom from the lips of the orator which Webster supposed John Adams to have uttered in the Congress that declared our independence, and which, in fact, he did in part predict in that very memorable letter to his ever-honored and cherished wife. No, sir, it would be no such oration as that; and it would be no 4th of July in the true spirit of a people proud in their independence, but a thousand times prouder of their freedom, their liberty, and the example they set to the world—an example which they hope in time and in the progress of civilization, education, and intelligence, will overturn every throne that now has a foot-hold on this globe, however deep may be its foundations. Well, sir, I cannot vote for so incongruous a thing. I cannot see how it can be. I cannot see how they can go together; and therefore it is that for that reason, were there no other reason, in my humble judgment the sooner we retrace our steps the better it will be.

I certainly sympathize with the gentlemen of the centennial commission, and with the gentlemen of this board of finance, and with all who have been aiding and abetting them, some of the most accomplished gentlemen and still more accomplished ladies of the land, in the efforts they have made to promote this celebration. No one will regret more than I if their labor should be lost; but I cannot sacrifice my convictions of the Constitution of the land and my convictions of propriety, taste, and good sense because there may be some mortification in the failure of an enterprise that every one sees now must be a failure unless we come to its aid.

There is still another reason why I cannot vote for this bill, and why I am in favor of retracing our steps, and the sooner the better. I do not mean to be in the slightest degree offensive in what I say. I do not mean to charge or insinuate that there has been any false pretense from first to last in all this business; and yet I do say that public morality is involved. I do say that it is a question of public morality. The first bill passed both Houses of Congress in 1871, approved March 3, 1871. When that bill was under consideration, it was most distinctly declared by those who advocated it that the Government of the United States would never be called on to pay one dollar; and when the Senator from Pennsylvania who sits farthest from me, [Mr. CAMERON,] and who had the bill in charge in this body, was asked "Why, then, do you want this act passed?" his answer was "Simply to give the thing character." That was all; simply to give it character. And it was most distinctly asserted that the Government of the United States never would be called upon for one single dollar. That bill passed. At the next session, on the 1st of June, 1872, another bill was approved, the act incorporating the centennial board of finance. When that bill was before us, it was again distinctly asserted in both Houses that the Government would not be called upon for one single dollar of expense; and, "to make assurance doubly sure" it was put distinctly in the bill itself that the Government was to be liable for not one single cent, either of compensation to anybody employed or for any debt that might be created. Nothing could be clearer; and that amendment was adopted by the unanimous vote of the Senate; not a man voted against it. It was reported by the Senator from Pennsylvania himself, reporting the bill back from the Committee on Foreign Relations with that amendment. The amendment was adopted without division, without one single "No" in all the Senate; and thus the pledge made, the only pledge made in the bill, is a pledge to the people of the United States that they should never be taxed to bear a dollar of the expense of this exhibition.

Now, sir, I remember that amendment very well, and the passage of that bill very well. I remember then that in my judgment I thought the whole thing would prove to be a failure. I remember that I said in private conversation, for I took very little part in the debate, "This thing cannot succeed; a great international exposition cannot succeed and never has succeeded without Government coming to its aid, and coming with millions to its aid. In all the history of this world there has been but one such exposition which financially proved a success, and that was in London, with her three millions of population. Everywhere else they have entailed heavy expense on the government. And this attempt by Philadelphia with her municipal financial aid or with the aid of the State of Pennsylvania, or with the voluntary subscriptions to stock contemplated by the bill creating a centennial board of finance, will be an utter failure so far as having a successful international exhibition is concerned." I did then suppose that the whole upshot of the business would be that it would very soon be found out that they could not raise the money necessary to such an exposition, and that the whole thing would be dropped.

But now, sir, when experience has proved what every man ought to have foreseen, that they cannot raise funds enough for the international exposition, instead of dropping it, they come to Congress and ask us to take it upon our shoulders and carry it through at an expense of ten, or fifteen, or perhaps twenty million dollars. There is no hope for it. We have heard some controversy as to what the exposition at Vienna cost Austria. My friend from California [Mr. SARGENT] says it cost Austria $10,000,000, and I understood him to say that there is a deficit of seven millions. That makes seventeen millions. Well, sir, if it cost Austria $17,000,000, where a florin will buy as much as a dollar will here, especially in those works which would be the subject of exposition, I want to know what is going to be the cost here. And now at a time when the whole business of this country is stagnant, and stagnant because Congress does not do its duty of deciding one way or the other upon what shall be the financial policy of the Government—for let us decide either way, business will resume its course in the wonted channels of commerce and trade—at the very time when business is stagnant, and when the Treasury of the United States has been staggering along, almost at times on the verge of bankruptcy, and when there is a universal cry throughout the country for reform and retrenchment, and when we are turning out poor clerks from the Departments here every day, men and women, in order to retrench a little, save a few thousands of dollars here and there, although I have seen them pass my house with tears in their eyes, not knowing where they would get their next day's bread since they had been turned out at a time like this, we are called upon to embark in an enterprise which my colleague calls "Philadelphia's little show," but which is likely to be the greatest and the most expensive show that ever was indulged in by the people of the United States, if this bill shall pass and the appropriation shall be made which it will require. And let no man tell me that if the Committee on Appropriations report a bill appropriating $3,000,000, or $5,000,000, the thing will stop there. No, sir; if it does stop there with an appropriation of $3,000,000, or even $5,000,000, the exhibition will be a failure and a disgrace to the country, and the American people will not submit to that. They do not like to be disgraced, or at least Congress does not like to be disgraced. Therefore, I say they may report a bill to-morrow and say that they will appropriate $5,000,000 and never will appropriate a dollar more, and they will not have said anything more than they said in the act of 1871. Congress then said that they would never appropriate one dollar, that the United States was never to be liable for a single dollar; and it will be just as easy to break another pledge, a pledge that it shall be liable only for five millions, and make it ten millions, fifteen millions, or twenty millions, if need be, as it is to break that pledge to the people of the United States that not one dollar of theirs should ever be expended for this purpose. No, sir; it is all useless; it will be like the estimate for a work of public improvement or a public building, the New York post-office for instance. I think the estimate for that work was $4,000,000 originally; that was to be the total cost of it; and yet if I am not mistaken in my recollection, nearly nine millions have been expended already, and the entire cost of it will exceed ten millions. So, sir, it will be with this exposition. You began by declaring you would give nothing. Now declare that you will give three millions and no more, and the end of it will be like the estimate for a public building, you will give all that taste, luxury, extravagance, or pride in the end may demand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the motion to refer, the following instructions:

With instructions to report a bill making appropriation of a sufficient sum of money from the Treasury of the United States, not exceeding $3,000,000, toward defraying the expense of the centennial celebration and exhibition to be held under the auspices of the United States at the city of Philadelphia in 1876, under such regulations as will secure the faithful application and expenditure of said appropriation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Kentucky have each challenged the constitutional right of Congress to make an appropriation for either a national or an international exposition. And it occurs to me that it would be a strange thing if every State, county, and township in the United States should have the power to apply public money to an exhibition, but that this great nation, which guarantees to them all the powers they have, is devoid of such power. It would be strange if every petty principality in the world should have the right to make an expenditure to celebrate its natal day, and the United States of America should have no such power. Mr. President, I do not so read the Constitution, and I have no difficulty in placing my finger on the provision of the Constitution which authorizes the expenditure.

The United States is not, sir, a mere agency of the States. It is a nation. It ceased to be an agency when the Constitution took the place of the Articles of Confederation; and we became the better recognized in the world as a nation when on our nationality being disputed by some of the States we successfully asserted it in the recent war.

What does the Constitution declare? In the eighth section of the first article, to which reference is made, there are some eighteen specifications of powers conferred upon the Federal Government. We are there authorized to legislate over the District of Columbia, to regulate commerce, to establish post-offices and post-roads, declare war, raise an army, provide a navy, &c.; and that article declares besides that the General Government has the power to collect taxes in order—I adopt the construction of the Senator from Ohio—in order that we may "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

It is claimed by the distinguished Senators from Kentucky and Ohio that the power to collect taxes to provide for the general welfare is only ancillary and in aid of the specific powers, referred to by this article, granted to Congress.

Mr. President, that construction cannot be given to this important provision, for two reasons.

The first reason is because at the end of this section, containing the specification of powers, the ancillary power to render those powers effective is given. It is there declared that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers. This provision, therefore, would have no office as an ancillary power.

But the conclusive answer to the claim that the provision to "provide for the general welfare" is only to be construed as a power given in aid of the specified powers is, that the Constitution does not say that it is ancillary to or in aid of those specifications, and you have no right to and cannot interpolate those words into the Constitution. The fact, sir, that so broad a power may be abused is no more of an argument against its existence than is the fact that the power of legislation may be abused, an argument against the existence of that power.

The meaning of the provision of the Constitution, as to the general welfare, is that we have power to collect taxes in order to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. It is a provision giving us as an aggregation of States, as a nation, the power to provide for our nationality as contradistinguished from provisions which relate to the States, and is to be so exercised, while we take care that we do not interfere with the rights of the States. That is the construction of this provision of the Constitution which has been given by some of those who have gone before us.

I will read a short extract from a message of President Monroe to the House of Representatives, on the 4th of March, 1822, in which he says:

It is manifestly incidental to the great objects of the first branch of the grant which authorizes Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; a power of vast extent, not granted by the Confederation, the grant of which formed one of the principal inducements to the adoption of this Constitution. If both parts of the grant are taken together, as they must be, for the one follows immediately after the other in the same sentence, it seems to be impossible to give to the latter any other construction than that contended for. Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. For what purpose? To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States—an arrangement and phraseology which clearly show that the latter part of the clause was intended to enumerate the purposes to which the money thus raised might be appropriated. * * * * *

Had it been intended that Congress should be restricted in the appropriation of the public money to such expenditures as were authorized by a rigid construction of the other specific grants, how easy it would have been to have provided for it by a declaration to that effect. The omission of such declaration is, therefore, an additional proof that it was not intended that the grant should be so construed. * *

Each Government should look to the great and essential purposes for which it was instituted and confine itself to those purposes. A State government will rarely, if ever, apply money to national purposes without making it a charge to the nation. * * * * * * *

It is believed that there is not a corporation in the Union which does not exercise great discretion in the application of the money raised by it to the purposes of its institution. It would be strange if the Government of the United States, which was instituted for such important purposes and endowed with such extensive powers, should not be allowed at least equal discretion and authority. The evil to be particularly avoided is the violation of State rights; shunning that, it seems to be more reasonable and proper that the powers of Congress should be so construed as that the General Government, in its intercourse with other nations, and in our internal concerns, should be able to adopt all such measures lying in the fair scope and intended to facilitate the direct objects of its power as the public welfare may require and a sound and provident policy dictate.

Then, John Quincy Adams, in his message of the 6th of December, 1825, gives a like construction to this provision of the Constitution. He says:

The great object of the institution of civil government is the improvement of the condition of those who are parties to the social compact. And no government, in whatever form constituted, can accomplish the lawful ends of its institution but in proportion as it improves the condition of those over whom it is established. * * * But moral, political, and intellectual improvement are duties assigned by the Author of our existence to social no less than to individual man. For the fulfillment of those duties governments are invested with power; and to the attainment of the end, the progressive improvement of the condition of the governed, the exercise of delegated powers is a duty as sacred and indispensable as the usurpation of powers not granted is criminal and odious. * * *

If these powers and others enumerated in the Constitution may be effectually brought into action by laws promoting the improvement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, the cultivation and encouragement of the mechanic and the elegant arts, the advancement of literature, and the progress of the sciences, ornamental and profound, to refrain from exercising them for the benefit of the people themselves would be to hide in the earth the talent committed to our charge, would be treachery to the most sacred of trusts.

The construction I present does not originate with me, and is not an idea that has sprung up to-day; it is the view of Monroe and of John Quincy Adams, and which has been acted on in numerous cases of legislation. This construction, too, I insist, has gained force by the history of our country during the last decade. It has become stronger and more clear just as our nationality has become better established.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does he regard the right "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" as unlimited? Is that power unlimited?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. STEVENSON. And if not unlimited, I hope I shall not trouble the Senator by asking him to tell us where the limitation is.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, as I said before, the possible abuse of any power is no argument against its existence; if it was we could disprove the existence of each and every power conferred by the Constitution.

I think my suggestions and the authorities I have read show that the power to collect taxes to provide for the general welfare is not ancillary to the specific powers, because the ancillary power is otherwise provided, and because the Constitution does not say that it is intended in aid of the specified powers. It is clearly a power to promote the welfare of the nation of the United States, as distinguished from the several States, and to be exercised so as not to interfere with the rights of the States; and the limitation of the power is that it is to be used for the welfare of the nation as such, and so as not to conflict with the rights of the several States.

Mr. President, one word in reference to this amendment. I do think it would be a matter of regret should we refuse to make a reasonable appropriation for this exposition. There can be no objection to our opening our doors to other nations, inasmuch as we have heretofore availed ourselves of the like entertainment offered by them to us. No one, I think, can object seriously to the expenditure. There are times when we may even afford to waste a little money. There is a time when it is right to break the alabaster box. The injunction, you remember, came to Moses on Mount Sinai, to "hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout the land;" and it was done in no miserly manner; not by an expenditure of a few thousand dollars, but by resting from all labor during the whole year; by forgiving all debts; by setting the bondman free, and by rejoicing throughout all the land because of their deliverance from bondage. We surely will not raise a question whether we, on the centennial of our birth, can afford the expenditure. No, sir; that is not the objection.

The main objection against this exhibition, originating with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] and adopted by the Senators from Nevada, and Kentucky, and Ohio, is that it would be contrary to good taste, refined delicacy; that it would in fact be impolite for us to invite the representatives of other nations to stand on our broad continent while we celebrated somewhere our jubilee of liberty. Why, sir, such exquisiteness would become girls of sixteen, but not us.

Mr. President, does any one suppose that it is proposed to have a saturnalia of vulgar boasting in the very aisles and walks of the exhibition; that it is the purpose to visit the alcoves and tables of our guests with drum and fife and din "Hail Columbia" and the "Star-Spangled Banner" into their ears; that we intend to have a corps of Fourth of July orators to harangue them, or a flock of American eagles to prey upon them? I trust something may be left to the good sense, to the good breeding, and to the native politeness of the American people.

And who is it that is to be offended? Is it France, who aided us most efficiently in obtaining the very liberties we celebrate, and who now boasts a republican government? Is it Spain, who, having outlived tyranny, now claims that she has a government by the people and for the people? Is it Italy, the home of the Cæsars, with its constitutional government? Or Germany, the cradle of religious freedom? Is it Switzerland, that had a republic, I believe, before our continent was discovered? Is it Holland, with her states-general, the asylum for the Huguenot and the Puritan, and the port from whence our fathers started when they came here to plant the tree of liberty? Or is it merry old England, which is to be insulted by our rejoicing over civil liberty? Why, Mr. President, the descendants of those renowned barons who waded through seas of blood to establish their own liberty will not be offended at our rejoicing. That people from whom we get the very foundation-stones of our liberties, the common law, and the great charter of Runnymede, will they object to hosannas to civil liberty? That people who, more than any other in the world, have brought the royal and the ecclesiastical tyrants to the block, and there taught them that law and not men was supreme, will not be offended by our celebration. The day has passed when we were wont to cherish animosity to England, and accustomed to talk of our grievances as colonists. Our passions are hushed; our animosities are subdued. She has with us one law, one language, one religion, and similar institutions. She is our kinfolk. She needs us and we need her; and whether you vote an appropriation or not, I predict that on the 4th of July, 1876, in old Independence Hall, we will strike hands with old England for the good of all mankind.

The representatives of these peoples among us smile at the idea of our assuming that they admit we are better friends of civil liberty than they, and at our supposing that they will be offended at our celebration.

If we want, sir, to make this exhibition a pecuniary and popular success, we must make it not national but international. One of the dullest and most stupid things in the world is a mere domestic fair or exhibition. Should we have at Philadelphia the Turks, Algerines, and Chinese, with the people from Nubia and Egypt and Greece and Persia, with their customs and their costumes, curiosity will be excited and the people will come from all parts of our land and make this exposition a grand popular and pecuniary success. They will there, too, be instructed as well as interested by the comparison of the works of art and of skill of the countries of the world. Twenty thousand people, too, no doubt, would come from foreign lands, and should they spend an average of $500 each, we would have our $10,000,000 of money. .

Besides, there is a matter of character in this question. We have been referred to the protests that Congress shall pay no money in aid of the exhibition, contained in the acts we have passed.. But, sir, we did not send that protest to other nations when notice was given them that there was to be an international exhibition here.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish the advocates of this bill would take either one ground or the other. According to my poor understanding, and according to the poor understanding of our diplomatic representatives abroad, the circular of the Secretary of State directing them to communicate the matter of this international exhibition to the governments to whom they were accredited, was an invitation. I never should have thought otherwise; but now it turns out, according to a letter read by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] a letter from the Secretary of State to our diplomatic representatives abroad, that they have totally misunderstood his meaning; that it was no invitation at all. Treating it as an invitation, about six powers have accepted it. But if it is an invitation, here is the glaring fact, that although it was given eight months ago, but one of the first powers of Europe has accepted it. If it is not an invitation, then I want to know why the Senator from New Jersey talks about our having communications back that will pay in money? If it is not an invitation, nobody has been invited, and the thing stands on a plain tabula rasa.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish that my friends in the Senate would never ask me questions more difficult to answer than that asked by the Senator from Ohio. I suppose that in strictness it was not an invitation that was sent; no more so at least than if my friend should send me a card stating that he was at home on Thursday evening from nine to eleven. That would not be an invitation; it does not tell me to come; but according to the customs of society I should feel authorized to visit him, and no doubt would be entertained. Notice was given foreign nations that this exhibition was to take place, and they understood it to be an invitation; and we cannot now withdraw it without subjecting ourselves to the charge of inhospitality.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I beg my friend to answer my other question. What does the Secretary of State mean by addressing a circular to our diplomatic representatives saying that it was not an invitation?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The question of the propriety of the conduct of the Secretary of State is not before us; but we know that he is a prudent officer. He probably saw in the laws the provision that Congress was to incur no expense, and probably feared that the mere notice that there was to be an exposition which the nations had received as an invitation, might commit our country further than he was authorized to permit.

Mr. President, I submit that we do not treat Pennsylvania fairly in this matter. To speak plainly, I think we treat her badly. It was by reason of the historic associations that cluster in this regard around Philadelphia that by common consent that locality was selected as the one of all others where this exhibition should be held. That being fixed, what was the State of Pennsylvania to do but go forward and take the initiative in the movement? And she and her people have subscribed two and a half millions to the fund; while every other State, with the exception of the subscription from the State I have the honor in part to represent, has withheld all aid or support. And now Congress says, "We will not interfere; go on with your grand show." It is not Pennsylvania's show; it is not Philadelphia's; it belongs to me, and to every other American citizen, and to every State of the Union. Whether, sir, we vote money or refuse to vote it, that exhibition I believe will go on. Our people have never yet taken the back track on the question of liberty, whether it was to wrest it from a foreign power, or whether it was to defend it at home, and they will not give up this celebration of the hundredth anniversary of its birth.

Mr. President, this is a measure in aid of peace, of good feeling, and the assimilation of the nations of the earth; and should have our hearty support. The ocean steamer and the telegraph have made of the nations a republic; so that a cry of distress in the feeblest nation is echoed all over Christendom; and next to these agencies, expositions like that proposed have done most to promote this friendly regard among the peoples of the earth. The people of other countries wish to know us. Up to the time of our recent war they had little faith in the permanency of our Republic. They believed that we would not submit to military discipline; that our Government was a rope of sand, which would break as soon as the concussion came. They have now changed their opinion. They see us united in good fellowship, a strong power; and they wish to know us better. Much ignorance exists in reference to us abroad. A gentleman told me recently that his daughter attended for some time a school in Liverpool, and that he examined the geography she studied, and found it contained only twenty-eight questions in reference to the United States, and that fourteen of those were wrongly answered. One question was, "What is the capital of the State of New York?" And the answer was, "The city of New York." [Laughter.] Again, "What is the capital of Pennsylvania?" "Philadelphia." "What is the chief town of Illinois?" And what does my friend from Illinois suppose the answer was? "Keokuk!" [Laughter.]

Let the people of other lands come here and learn what our civilization is; let them see our schools, our churches; see our treatment and high estimate of woman; and see our refinement. Let them come and see a people who have inalienable rights; and when they go home they will not rest until they have inalienable rights for themselves.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. Will my friend give way to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. STEWART. I want to make just a remark or two, and then I will yield.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have an adjournment.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is five o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. And many Senators wish to speak.

Mr. STEWART. I will not occupy a moment. I simply rise to call attention to the fact that we are now told we have much to learn in republicanism from the monarchies of Europe, and to suggest to my friend from New Jersey that our style of oratory on that occasion must be very much changed from the Fourth of July orations I have been accustomed to if we are to adopt his style to-day. If we are to model our republican institutions and our ideas of liberty on the examples he has given us to-day from the Old World; if we are to learn from them and not they from us; if we cannot speak of liberty without offending them because they are so eminently free, our style of oratory has been a mistake all the time. We have been claiming for ourselves free institutions, that we had something better than they had in the Old World; we have been proclaiming that we intended to agitate the question of republian liberty until the Old World became republican. That has been our idea; and now are we to say that our ideas of republican institutions are not sufficiently advanced to grate at all upon them, or to conflict at all with their settled notions, and that they would admire all we have to say; that England has so far advanced, that she has such free institutions and such a liberal people that they will admire our political ideas and our style of Fourth of July orations? I think if we pass eulogies on their free institutions up to the standard of the Senator from New Jersey, we shall offend our people somewhat. I do not think they will come prepared to hear such eulogies. I do not think the millions who have come here to escape the oppression of the Old World will go to the celebration with a great deal of relish to hear the republican institutions of Europe eulogized.

Mr. SUMNER. Now let us have an adjournment.

Mr. STEWART. Very well, I will give way.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. I believe the Senator desires the floor.

Mr. STOCKTON. That is all I desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. STEWART. I have not got quite through. I want to make a few more suggestions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was mistaken.

Mr. SARGENT. So was I.

Mr. STEWART. I will give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the ear of the Senator from California for a moment.

Mr. SARGENT. It is impossible to sit this bill out to-night.

Mr. CAMERON. I beg the Senator from California to listen to me for a moment.

Mr. SARGENT. With great pleasure.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to-morrow, if we adjourn now, to continue the centennial bill until it is finished. You will have to decide it some time, and you may as well decide it now as hereafter. By deciding it now you will do a great favor to my feelings and my affections, and I beg that you will do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

CONTRACTS OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of April 21, 1808, a statement of contracts made by the various Bureaus of the War Department on behalf of the United States during the year 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to present the memorial of E. S. Jaffray & Co., and hundreds of others, merchants, bankers, banks, insurance companies, and business men, of the city of New York, representing an aggregate capital of over $470,000,000, against any increase of irredeemable currency by the Government, and protesting against the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in issuing Treasury notes without authority of law. I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners beg leave respectfully to represent that they are greatly alarmed at the assumption by the Secretary of the Treasury of the right to issue new United States notes, commonly known as greenbacks, without the sanction of law.

The issue of irredeemable paper money, and making it a legal tender, is simply levying a forced loan upon the people of the United States. Such an extreme measure can only be excused by the vital necessity arising from a great war, and is even then in direct violation of all ordinary constitutional powers. So far as your petitioners are aware, no civilized government has ever resorted to the issue of irredeemable paper money in a time of peace; and it is a most remarkable event that the great, rich, and prosperous nation of the United States should resort to such a ruinous expedient, without the slightest necessity to excuse it.

Your petitioners, consequently, respectfully but most earnestly urge your honorable body to put an immediate stop to the further issue of greenbacks by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to make arrangements, by the negotiation of bonds or otherwise, to call in and cancel at once every dollar of the so-called reserve which has been issued.

The memorial is signed as follows:

PRINTING OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. SPEER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and, under the law, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House one thousand extra copies of bill H. R. No. 792, to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, the number already printed being exhausted.

REFUNDING OF THE COTTON TAX.

Mr. WHITE, (on behalf of Mr. STEPHENS, who is detained from his seat by illness,) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2338) to refund the cotton tax; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DUTIES ON IMPORTED WINES.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2339) to regulate the duties on imported wines; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. RANDALL. How does that get in?

The SPEAKER. It is reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] from the Committee on Ways and Means, which is entitled to report at any time for committal. The gentleman asks that it may be considered in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point of order that the bill, being a tax bill, must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOOD. Before the gentleman objects I desire to say that it is a proposition to increase the revenue nearly $2,000,000; and there are various grave reasons why it ought to be passed as speedily as possible. It will take but a few minutes. I do not intend to detain the House by a speech upon it, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no doubt that the Committee on Ways and Means understand this subject thoroughly, because they have examined it; but the House is not in the same advantageous position, and therefore I make the point of order.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Why, this is in the line of protection; and I wonder that the gentleman objects. The very thing we should tax is wine.

Mr. WOOD. The bill could have been passed by this time. I will state very briefly the changes proposed in the existing law by the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania having made the point of order, the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McKEE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on the Territories.

EXECUTION OF THE LAWS IN UTAH.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back, with amendments and with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2204) concerning the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKEE. This bill is quite lengthy, and unless it is to be considered now I do not wish to take up time in the morning hour by having the bill read. It has been printed with the exception of a few small amendments, and I would rather that some day should be set for its consideration so that the whole House may have time to read and consider it, and, if they wish it, time to discuss it. I do not wish to press it now and keep it in the morning hour from day to day. It is an important bill, and might take up the morning hour indefinitely. I ask unanimous consent that it be set for consideration for the third Tuesday in March, at half-past one o'clock. There is a proposition prepared by the minority of the committee which has not been presented, but which they wish to bring before the House this morning.

Mr. CROUNSE. In behalf of five members of the committee I wish to present a substitute for this bill.

Mr. McKEE. I ask that this bill may be made a special order for the third Tuesday of this month, at half-past one o'clock, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. COX. I think it had better be set for a more distant day.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment to the fact that, in my judgment, this bill should be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is essentially a judicial question. The title of the bill is "Concerning the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes." It proposes to remodel all the courts, all the juries, and the various machinery of the courts in Utah. The subject was first before the Committee on the Judiciary, and we began its consideration. It was afterward taken up by the Committee on the Territories. I understand that committee to be very nearly equally divided upon it, six in the majority and five in the minority. I think that we, in the Committee on the Judiciary, can come to a more unanimous conclusion, one way or the other. I do not wonder that the Committee on the Territories are divided. This is a new matter to them, one entirely beyond their proper cognizance. I hope that the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who already have three bills upon this subject before them, including one of which this was a draught, and which is under consideration by my learned colleague, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.] At the proper time I will make the motion to refer.

Mr. McKEE. I desire to state that as to the question of jurisdiction the Committee on the Territories, under the rules of this House, have almost exclusive jurisdiction of this subject, while the Committee on the Judiciary has only such jurisdiction as may be conferred upon it by a reference of the bill; only that and no more.

Mr. POTTER. This bill is something like one which was before the last Congress, and which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was discussed during the entire two sessions of that Congress, and the committee finally, after a very mature consideration, arrived at a unanimous conclusion upon the subject. The chairman of the committee, Judge Bingham, was directed to report the bill to the House, but owing to the lateness of the session he had no opportunity to do so. This bill provides for a new system of drawing juries in the Territory of Utah, owing to the particular situation of affairs there, but at the same time it is important in the precedent it will establish. The consideration of the subject has been again resumed by the Committee on the Judiciary of this Congress, and I quite agree with the chairman of that committee, [Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts,] that it is probable we will soon arrive at nearly a unanimous conclusion upon the subject. I think if we proceed to consider the report of the Committee on the Territories it will not result in any wise or prudent legislation.

Mr. McKEE. The Committee on the Judiciary have failed to bring forward a bill; they failed in the last Congress. This bill is nothing new; it has been passed heretofore by the House, and I think by the Senate.

Mr. POTTER. We have failed to bring it before the House this session because our committee has not yet been reached on this call, and we failed last session merely because the committee were not called.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McKEE] in his proposition for assignment to except appropriation bills.

Mr. McKEE. I make that exception.

The SPEAKER. The proposition requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not yet been read; all this discussion is informal, but the Chair has indulged it, because he supposed some arrangement might be agreed to.

Mr. McKEE. I call for the reading of the rule relative to the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Territories.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Territories to examine into the legislative, civil, and criminal proceedings of the Territories, and to devise and report to the House such means as in their opinion may be necessary to secure the rights and privileges of residents and non-residents.

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt whatever that the Committee on the Territories have perfect authority to report this bill, nor is there any doubt whatever that the House has the right to refer it to another committee; it is merely a question for the majority of the House to determine.

Mr. COX. With the permission of the gentleman who reported this bill [Mr. McKEE] I would like to say one word in favor of its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McKEE. I will withdraw the bill for the present in order to report other bills from our committee, after which I will report this bill; and if the House will sustain me, I will keep it in the morning hour until disposed of.

Mr. COX. Well, Mr. Speaker, is the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts now pending or is the bill withdrawn?

Mr. McKEE. It is only withdrawn temporarily, in order that we may report another bill. This bill will come up again before this morning hour is out.

RAILROAD IN THURSTON COUNTY, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. HOSKINS, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back with an amendment, in the form of a substitute, the bill (H. R. No. 767) to authorize the county commissioners of Thurston County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Budd's Inlet, Puget Sound, to intersect the North Pacific Railroad at or near Tenino.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be treated as an original bill.

The substitute (H. R. No. 2340) was read. It provides that the county commissioners of Thurston County, in Washington Territory, be authorized and empowered to contract with any legally authorized corporation or individuals to construct and equip a railroad from Budd's Inlet, Puget Sound, to connect with the North Pacific Railroad at or near Tenino, all in the said county of Thurston, and to issue bonds of Thurston County in aid thereof, which bonds shall bear interest not exceeding 10 per cent. per annum, and the principal whereof shall not exceed in amount 7 per cent. of the value of the taxable property of the county, as legally assessed for territorial taxation, and shall not in any event exceed in the aggregate $200,000, notwithstanding this sum may be less than 7 per cent. of such taxable valuation; and any such bonds in excess of said 7 per cent. of the territorial taxable valuation of the property of the county, or in excess of $200,000 in the aggregate in any event, shall be absolutely void; and all persons interested are required to take notice thereof. The county commissioners are authorized to designate the time and manner of payment of the principal and interest of said bonds; and also to determine the class and gauge of said railroad; but no bonds are to be issued until the full and final completion of the road; and the county is not to contract with any person, firm, or corporation to construct the road until such person, firm, or company shall enter into a good and sufficient bond in the penal sum of $100,000, to be secured by a first mortgage on the road, conditioned that they will operate the road with passenger and freight trains for a period of twenty-five years. The second section of the bill provides that when the county commissioners shall have agreed upon the terms for the construction of the road with any individual, firm, or corporation, they shall call a special election, at such time as they may designate, by causing three notices of such election, which notices shall embrace the terms of the proposed contract, to be posted for twenty days in each election precinct of the county, in the most public places in each precinct, at which election the proposed contract shall be submitted to the legal voters of the county. If two-thirds of the votes cast at that election shall be in favor of the contract, and such two-thirds shall be equal in number to a majority of the votes cast in the county at the next preceding election for a Delegate in the Congress of the United States, then the county commissioners shall complete the agreement and issue the bonds provided for by this act, but not otherwise. Such election is to be held at the same places, and in the same manner, and the returns thereof made and filed with the same officers, as required in the case of elections for county officers under the laws of the Territory.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the bill printed?

Mr. HOSKINS. The bill as originally introduced has been printed; but the substitute reported by the committee has not been printed.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I make the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to have it printed, because it involves the very important question whether the Government of the United States should force upon a county of a Territory the creation of a debt.

Mr. HOSKINS. With the permission of the Chair, I will state the provisions of the bill. I am not particular, so far as I am concerned, whether it be recommitted or be passed now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I reserve the right to make a point of order on the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. As the gentleman reporting the bill is not unwilling, then I suggest that the bill be allowed to go to the Committee of the Whole, and be printed. Thus we shall all have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. HOSKINS. Let me first state the provisions of the bill; and objections may be raised afterward.

The bill provides that the county of Thurston, in the Territory of Washington, may issue the bonds of that county in the sum of $200,000, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Olympia, the capital of the Territory, to Tenino, a point on the Northern Pacific Railroad. It provides that the county commissioners may enter into a contract with any individual, firm, or corporation to build this road; but before the contract is to be concluded the terms of the contract are to be submitted to the legal voters of the county at a general election called for that purpose.

Mr. SPEER. How many voters are there in the county?

Mr. McFADDEN. From forty-five hundred to five thousand.

Mr. HOSKINS. If two-thirds of the votes at that general election shall be cast in favor of making the contract for this purpose—those two-thirds being equal to a majority of all the votes cast at the last election for a Delegate in Congress—then the county commissioners are authorized to perfect the contract. This is also guarded; so in no event can bonds be issued against this county to exceed 7 per cent. of the taxable property of the county; neither can they issue bonds in excess of $200,000; and they cannot issue a single bond until it shall have first been approved by two-thirds of all of the votes cast at a general election held for that purpose. Therefore, I conceive, Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible to guard the bill more strongly, thoroughly, and specifically than this bill is guarded in order to protect the rights of the citizens in this county of Thurston.

Mr. KASSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York if this bill is proposed to Congress by virtue of a petition of the citizens of that county?

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a memorial from the citizens of the county of Thurston, stating that this question has been once submitted to them, and a majority of all the citizens in the county of Thurston has voted in favor of this proposition before coming to Congress asking for this legislation. It has been submitted also to the Legislature of Washington Territory and has passed that territorial Legislature. It has been approved by the people and by the territorial Legislature; and the memorial stating these facts and asking for this legislation, I hold in my hand.

Mr. KASSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York this further question: Would this be deemed invalid as an act of the territorial Legislature without the sanction of Congress? I wish to know that fact, because I do not remember of a bill like this ever having passed Congress before, relating to a particular county. I may be mistaken; but I do not remember before of any similar case of legislation so peculiarly local.

Mr. HOSKINS. In answer to the gentleman from Iowa, I have only to say that I am informed by the Delegate from Washington Territory this whole question has been canvassed in that Territory thoroughly as to whether the territorial Legislature has power to grant the relief requested, and it has been determined by judicial authority they have not the power in the territorial Legislature, under the organic act, to pass this legislation. Therefore they come to Congress to get it legalized, in order that their bonds may be put upon the market and the road constructed.

Mr. KASSON. I thank the gentleman for that information, and will say one thing more. I would rather change the organic law of the Territory in that respect, leaving the responsibility with the people, through their immediate representatives, than to pass a special act for the first time within my knowledge in which Congress deals with the local affairs of a county.

Allow me to add a single word further. In my own State our counties have had a most bitter experience with this kind of legislation. They have, by virtue of just such legislation as this, almost bankrupted themselves, bringing discredit on the State and indebtedness to the people. Hence, as far as we are from that Territory, I repeat, I would much rather change the organic law, if this thing must be done, leaving the responsibility with the people there, than to do it by an act of Congress.

Mr. HOSKINS. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Territories which I have presented, and I have also presented all the facts bearing upon the case. I now yield to the gentleman from Washington Territory, who will be able further to explain why it is necessary this bill should pass at once.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I wish to say to my friend from Iowa on my left [Mr. KASSON] this is not singular legislation at all. An act has been heretofore passed authorizing the people of Walla Walla County to do this same thing on a certain vote by a majority of the people.

Mr. HOSKINS. I hope the House will be brought to order, as it is impossible to hear the Delegate from Washington Territory.

The SPEAKER. The House is now in order, and the gentleman from Washington Territory will resume his remarks.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I was remarking, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation was not singular at all; that Congress by an act had authorized Walla Walla County to resort to the same process for raising funds to aid in the construction of what was known as the Columbia and Walla Walla Railroad Company. The proposition was submitted to the voters of Walla Walla County, but not being acceptable to them it was voted down.

By the sixth section of the organic law of Washington Territory we are prohibited from incurring any responsibility, such as is contemplated by this bill, and the only remedy we have is to come here to secure the privilege of doing this thing under authority of an act of Congress.

This is a matter which has been thoroughly passed upon by our people. There are gentlemen upon the floor of this House who are familiar with the necessity for railroad connection between the extreme southern terminus of Budd's Inlet, which is the southern point of Puget Sound, and the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad at Tenino. We do not come here and ask Congress to grant us a subsidy of land; we do not come here and ask Congress to appropriate money to aid in the construction of this road; we only ask that our hands may be unfettered from the restrictions imposed upon us by the organic act so we may be permitted to use the means provided by our own labor for constructing with our own means this necessary railroad connection.

I know that difficulties have arisen in some of the States from the principle of legislation authorizing the giving of aid to railroads by the issue of bonds of the different counties. But I take it, Mr. Speaker, that no bill with that put in was ever more carefully guarded than this. The county commissioners are required, when they shall agree on the terms of the contract with individuals or a corporation for the construction of this road, to submit the terms of the contract to the legal voters of the county. The proposition shall be embraced in printed notices, which are to be placed for twenty days in each election precinct; and to carry the proposition it will be necessary that two-thirds of the votes cast at the polls shall be in its favor; which two-thirds of the votes shall in the aggregate equal the majority of the votes cast at the next preceding election for Delegates of Congress. Unless this is secured the measure is defeated.

I will say to the House that this proposition was submitted to the voters last fall in my county of Thurston, and the pressing necessity for the enterprise and the urgent reasons weighing with the people in its favor were such as to lead to a seven-eighths vote being cast in favor of the proposition.

There is another provision to which I wish to call the attention of the House. It is that no dollar of money can be appropriated, and that no bond can be issued by the county commissioners to pay for this enterprise, either directly or indirectly, until the road has been built, thoroughly equipped, and in running order.

Now, I ask, is it possible that the people can be wronged by a measure of this kind? You have given to railroad companies lands and large sums of money to construct railroads. We a feeble community, remote from the center of population and the center of capital, ask simply that you shall not fetter our hands, but enable us to use our own means in the construction of this road, so necessary for the development of the resources of our country. Who can be injured by it? What improper principle of legislation will be recognized? For certainly no gentleman will rise to-day and undertake to say, however objectionable the principle might be in the abstract, that any constitutional objection can apply to a proposition of this kind. The question is, I take it, res adjudicata. There are but two adverse decisions, one of which has been repudiated by the Supreme Court of the United States; and the rulings of that court as late as the present term recognize the right to issue those bonds, and recognize the validity of those bonds, even when improvidently and irregularly issued.

It will be seen on the reading of the bill, if gentlemen will give it their attention, that the provision of this bill, authorizing the county commissioners to issue bonds, is thoroughly guarded in every particular. Perfect and complete protection is thrown over the citizens of the county. They cannot be involved in the construction of a road which will not be completed. They cannot be involved in the construction of a road which will not be equipped and put into running order. The bill requires that at the time the contract is entered into, the persons with whom the contract is made, and who have undertaken the construction and equipment of the road, shall execute a bond to the people in the sum of $100,000, conditioned that the road shall be equipped and run with freight and passenger trains for the period of twenty-five years.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that this bill had not been printed with its several provisions guarding and protecting the tax-payer; but I supposed, this being a short road, that might not have been considered necessary. I do not wish to detain the House. I would have liked that the bill had been printed, and that every member could have had an opportunity of scanning carefully the provisions giving protection to the tax-payer; and then I would have had an opportunity more distinctly to have explained to the House the importance and necessity of this enterprise. I will only say further that it is an enterprise in which the interests of our people are bound up; and they are now anxiously waiting, daily and hourly, for the news of the passage of this bill. An engineer has already made his report on the line of road and the estimated cost of its construction; and the road, if the House will allow us to use our own means in its construction, will be running and equipped with freight and passenger cars by the 1st day of July next.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] if this road runs through, or will in any way interfere with, the Indian reservation of Washington Territory?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Not at all.

Mr. HOSKINS. I am very glad that this question has been propounded. When I was up I had intended, in the very few remarks I submitted, to touch upon that point; and I desire to say to the members of this House that this road is a road between sixteen and seventeen miles in length, running from the capital of Washington Territory, Olympia, to a place called Tenino, on the Northern Pacific Railroad. It does not run through one foot of reservation or territory owned or claimed by the Indians. Nor will the proposed route pass through one single foot of property or territory belonging to the United States. Every inch of this road will pass through property owned by citizens of this Territory, and not a single foot of it will be claimed by Indians or by the United States. The bill is not subject to the objection that it appropriates one single foot of the public domain or one single dollar from the national Treasury.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: If there is any objection on the part of the citizens to the construction of this road?

Mr. HOSKINS. I will say, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Connecticut, that I am told—of course I cannot state from my own knowledge—but I am told by the Delegate from the Territory that the people along the line of the road are anxious to contribute to its construction. All that is asked is the right of way without a single dollar of appropriation. The citizens along the road simply desire to be permitted by Congress to build the road on their own territory, and with their own money, and the bill is guarded by everything that can be thrown around this concession. It protects the citizens in all their rights.

I may say further, in addition, that it interferes with no private rights, that there is no corporation claiming the right of way over or upon the line proposed, and I repeat, that the bill asks no appropriation of the public domain or of the public treasure.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. BURCHARD. I presume this is as meritorious a bill as any private bill of this nature that can be proposed. My objection is not to this particular bill, but to the principle involved in it, namely, the authorizing of counties, towns, or cities by Congress to pledge their credit to aid in building a railroad or any other private enterprise of that character. As was said by the gentleman from Iowa, all through the West, not only in his own State, but in Wisconsin and Illinois, towns, cities, and counties are covered with these bonds and obligations. The records of the Supreme Court are now burdened with cases involving the validity of those bonds. The State courts have decided over and over again, some of them at least, that neither in equity nor in right can the State grant power to a municipal corporation to pledge the credit of its inhabitants to aid in the building of these railroads, and I am against the whole principle. I believe, on the contrary, that instead of authorizing any Territory to give that aid, we ought to expressly prohibit it.

I could point out how this matter is manipulated by these railroad corporations, their employés, for instance, moving along from town to town and county to county and living there long enough to get a habitation merely to enable themselves to vote to pledge that county, to bind its inhabitants for the future to be taxed to aid in the building of those railroads, having no personal interest in the welfare of the county. But I cannot stop to discuss that proposition. Our own State has put in its organic act lately, and made it a part of the constitution of the State, that hereafter no town, county, or city, or municipal corporation within that State, shall bind itself or its inhabitants to give such aid or pledge its credit. That provision is approved by the people and was adopted by an overwhelming majority, and we feel a pride in that portion of our constitution as much as in any other portion of it. I hope therefore that this provision will not be adopted.

Mr. HOSKINS. I now yield three minutes to my colleague from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. I accept, for the purpose of this discussion, the statements made on the floor of the House to-day, as to the value of this railway as a measure of local improvement and its entire freedom from special objection, but, notwithstanding that, I beg the attention of the House to the principle involved in this bill. The Congress has provided, and I think most wisely provided, in the organic act organizing the Territory of Washington, that there shall be no power in any county, or municipal corporation, or even in the territorial Legislature itself, to authorize one part of the inhabitants to pledge the property of the other part for any work of public improvement. Now it is proposed to repeal, as far as this railway is concerned, that wise provision, and to repeal it at a time when, as the gentleman from Illinois has shown the House, all the States of the Union which have pursued this policy have found it dangerous, resulting in litigation and sometimes in repudiation, until to-day, in the fundamental law of Pennsylvania, and I think in the fundamental law of several of the other States, an absolute prohibition is put upon the Legislatures of those States against conferring any such powers as we are asked to confer now on this far-off county in Washington Territory without knowledge of the locality or the necessities of the case.

The gentleman who has charge of the bill has said that the inhabitants of the locality only ask power to pledge their own property to build a railroad for themselves. Not at all. That power they have now; but this bill, if it becomes a law, will confer upon two-thirds of the inhabitants of that county the power to pledge, not their own property, but the property of the other third, for the purpose of this railway. That is, it will enable two-thirds of the inhabitants to pledge the property of the other third for an improvement that but this two-thirds of the people want.

This is a power against every principle of sound legislation. It never should have been tolerated in any republican government, and ought to be condemned right here and now by this House.

Mr. HOSKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE,] a member of the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. CROUNSE. This bill involves a principle upon which the people of this country are divided, a principle which has divided the courts of this Union. I may perhaps say that while the sentiment heretofore has been in favor of granting this kind of aid, there may be a revolution going on which is working the other way. If so, that revolution is induced not because the principle underlying this legislation is wrong and pernicious, but because in the practice of it abuses have grown up which have been burdensome and oppressive to the people who have been legislated for. I apprehend that it is only the abuse that needs to be guarded against. The case which is presented here is a case where, without the interposition of this Congress, no aid of a public character can be given to this enterprise; and it devolves upon us the duty of considering calmly whether in its provisions this bill is sufficiently guarded in all particulars to make it a proper one for the approbation of this Congress. I apprehend that this is a bill of that character.

I know that the Committee on the Territories approached the consideration of this bill in the same spirit which perhaps actuates many members here, a spirit of hostility to any legislation of this kind. The bill was considered carefully, section by section, with reference thereto, and every possible guard that could be suggested has been incorporated into this bill. I come from a State where this sort of legislation has prevailed to some extent; and I know that upon the whole it has been beneficial to the State of Nebraska. I represent to-day upon this floor not less perhaps than three hundred thousand souls; I represent a State that has not less than twelve hundred miles of railroad. Every foot of that railroad has been built by just the kind of aid which is sought here. And I know further that not one foot of that railroad would probably have been built to-day had it not been for such aid, and Nebraska would to-day have been almost a wild without it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] is one of a number of Representatives whose constituencies are worth millions, and who, without their great railroad interests, would, as it were, be worth nothing. The railroads, and they alone, have built up the States which they represent. This Territory is away off by itself; it is represented here by a Delegate who has the simple privilege of opening his mouth, but who has no vote upon a question of vital interest to his people. For some reason or other in the organic law of that Territory was a clause prohibiting giving aid of this kind. That Delegate has brought forward here a case which I think in all particulars must commend itself to the good judgment of every member here. His people cannot at once raise the means for building this road. They are willing, however, to put an incumbrance upon their property of every kind, not to exceed 7 per cent., and let the burden be distributed equally over them all, when by a two-thirds vote it shall be deemed advisable by the people. With all these guards around the bill it does seem proper that the gentleman making this request, perhaps the only one which he will ask in behalf of his Territory, should not be refused by this Congress.

Mr. SPEER. I desire one moment to correct a statement which has been made.

Mr. HOSKINS. I call the previous question on this bill; and I give notice that I will not withdraw that call.

Mr. SPEER. It has been stated here that there were between 4,000 and 5,000 voters in the county affected by this bill. I desire to say that there are but 778 voters, and the passage of this bill may result in a tax of $250 on each one of them.

The question being taken upon seconding the call for the previous question, upon a division there were—ayes 46, noes 47; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOSKINS and Mr. BURCHARD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 80, noes 78.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. On ordering the main question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 39 in the affirmative, (more than one-fifth of the last vote.)

Mr. BURCHARD. Pending the order for the main question, I move to lay the bill on the table.

The question was taken on laying the bill on the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 68, noes 69; no quorum voting.

Mr. BURCHARD. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion, for it will come to that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HYNES. Would it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, so as to recommit the bill to the committee?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to lay on the table was withdrawn the motion to reconsider would be in order.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have no objection to its being recommitted.

Mr. RANDALL. It should go to the Committee of the Whole, if anywhere.

Mr. FORT. I think it should go back to the committee.

Mr. BURCHARD. With the understanding that it shall be recommitted I withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall object to recommitting the bill to the Committee on the Territories. We already have the sense of that committee on the subject. I propose that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to lay on the table is withdrawn, a majority of the House can determine the reference.

The motion of Mr. HYNES, to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, was agreed to.

The question recurring on seconding the previous question, it was not seconded.

Mr. HYNES. I now move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the motion so as to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HYNES. I accept that amendment as a modification of my motion.

The SPEAKER. Then the motion is simply to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And that it be printed.

Mr. HYNES. I modify my motion by adding a provision that the bill be printed.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEATTLE AND WALLA WALLA RAILROAD.

Mr. HOSKINS reported, from the Committee on the Territories, a bill (H. R. No. 2341) granting the right of way to the Seattle and Walla Walla Railroad and Transportation Company, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

EXECUTION OF LAWS IN UTAH.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2204) concerning the execution of laws in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but was interrupted by

Mr. G. F. HOAR, who said: I desire to make a point of order on this bill. The bill is very long, and perhaps it may save time to make the point now, though I will reserve it until the close of the reading, if the Chair deems that course best.

The SPEAKER. What point does the gentleman make?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The rule adopted by the House at the present session provides that—

Bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, shall be first discussed in Committee of the Whole.

Now, this bill provides for a large number of new offices. For instance, in the first section it provides for the appointment of deputy marshals, and in the third section for the appointment of assistant district attorneys. It prescribes the duties of these new officers, and that "the same fees and emoluments as the district attorney would be entitled to for the same service shall be allowed for the services of assistant district attorneys." Then the twenty-third section provides for the appointment of other new officers of the United States, to wit, judges and clerks of election. All these provisions peremptorily require an appropriation of money from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McKEE. The bill makes no appropriation of money and requires no new appropriation. A deputy marshal or an assistant district attorney will draw but the same pay which the marshal or the district attorney would have drawn. The bill creates no new office, but merely assistants; and it makes no appropriation of money.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. There may be ten of these assistant district attorneys trying different causes at different times; and they are all to be paid by fees from the Treasury of the United States; and an appropriation of money must be made to provide for their compensation. It must be manifest that the creation of a dozen new offices must impose additional expense upon the United States. Under this bill the Government may be paying from the Treasury ten men when without the bill it would be paying but one man.

Mr. McKEE. To speak more correctly, the United States will be paying for so many prosecutions—no more, no less. If an assistant district attorney, instead of the district attorney himself, attends to a prosecution, the assistant receives the pay instead of the district attorney. The bill requires no new appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Does the bill authorize the appointment of any officer not already authorized by the Government of the United States?

Mr. McKEE. It requires the appointment of assistant attorneys.

The SPEAKER. Not now authorized by law?

Mr. POTTER. And assistant marshals.

The SPEAKER. The point which the Chair wants to get at is this: Does the bill create any additional office or officers for which the United States will be responsible and which do not now exist by law?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Eight or ten.

Mr. McKEE. I say they are not new offices.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, in making his point of order, directed attention to the twenty-third section, among others. As that section is brief, the Chair will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That at any general or special election held in the Territory of Utah, the election precincts shall be established and designated at least thirty days before the election. The governor, United States attorney, and secretary of the Territory shall have power to appoint one judge and one clerk of election for each election precinct in the Territory so established, and to establish such additional precincts as may be necessary to secure to the people a free and fair election, and to appoint the judges and clerks of election at such additional precincts.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let me make one suggestion. Will it be germane for me to move a provision specifically establishing the salary of these officers?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was coming to that. He will direct the Clerk to read the first section of the bill.

Mr. McKEE. Right here I should like to say these are territorial officers, and that the Government does not pay them at all.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read a portion of the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the United States marshal of Utah Territory may appoint deputies in each of the judicial districts of said Territory; said deputies shall be authorized to enter upon the discharge of their duties upon the approval of such appointments by the judge of the district court of the district in which each is appointed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also read a part of the third section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the United States district attorney of said Territory may also appoint assistants in each of the judicial districts of said Territory: Provided, That before any such assistant shall enter upon the discharge of his duties, his appointment shall be approved by the presiding judge of the district court of the district for which such appointment is made; and said assistant shall take and subscribe to the same oath prescribed by law to be taken by the district attorney, and said appointment, approval, and oath shall be entered upon the records of said courts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs particular attention to the following paragraph:

The Clerk read as follows:

The same fees and emoluments as the district attorney would be entitled to for the same service shall be allowed for the services of assistant district attorneys.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi, who reports the bill from the Committee on the Territories, will observe this does actually create a large number of new offices under the authority of the United States; and although it does not designate any special salary to be paid to them except in the case just read, yet it would be perfectly germane to move as an amendment to the bill an appropriation of a sum of money specifically fixing their salaries. The rule which the House is now acting under, adopted at the beginning of this session, was intended to entirely do away with any indirect appropriation from the Treasury; and the Chair thinks this does bind and require the United States to make an appropriation of money should it become a law. The Chair further thinks an amendment to this bill should it be considered in the House, fixing a specific salary for the officers authorized in this bill, would be a germane amendment which he could not rule out.

Mr. McKEE. I submit to the Speaker that when a proposition is made to give salaries to these officers, then, and not till then, does this question of order arise.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi contemplate that all the officers provided for in this bill shall serve without salary?

Mr. McKEE. Only with such salary as is now allowed by law; that, and not one dollar more.

The SPEAKER. But these offices do not now exist.

Mr. McKEE. An assistant attorney can hardly be considered as an officer at all, because at all times any United States attorney may get any other attorney to assist him in the discharge of his duties.

The SPEAKER. But how will it be in regard to the different judges of election precincts throughout the Territory?

Mr. McKEE. They would come in under the territorial law. There are such judges of election precincts in existence in that Territory now.

The SPEAKER. And they are authorized to be appointed by the United States for this purpose.

Mr. McKEE. There is a provision as to who shall appoint them, and that one at least shall be appointed by the governor instead of allowing the territorial Legislature to appoint them all. It merely provides for the appointment of one by the governor, and does not change the source of their pay in any respect whatever. It does not make any change in the least in that respect, but merely provides the governor shall appoint in certain cases.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations now reports appropriations to pay for prosecutions by the United States district attorneys in the Territories. Such appropriations come regularly in the appropriation bill, and in case any new offices are provided by this bill, we would have, of course, to provide for an appropriation to pay for their services.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot help thinking this bill will require for its enforcement a considerable appropriation of money from the United States Treasury. Does the gentleman himself state that it would not require any appropriation?

Mr. McKEE. I certainly do; and I also state that I would oppose any amendment offered to the bill in the House which would propose any appropriation, as I would oppose any appropriation bill to pay these officers any further salary than that which they now get. They do not get more money than the district attorney would get for discharging these duties without the assistance of these persons.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Mississippi will pardon me for a single observation. Now all the fees go to the district attorney up to a certain point. When he gets his salary the remainder is covered into the Treasury of the United States. The fees may amount to $100,000, but he only gets a certain amount. If he has so many assistants authorized by law, who are to receive pay under this bill, then they are to be paid out of the fees and emoluments, and to that extent the money is taken out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. POTTER. They would have to be paid by appropriation either in this or some other bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I wish to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear suggestions, because on a point of this kind he wishes to decide after the fullest deliberation.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suggest that that bill is so framed that an amendment could properly be added to it which would pay these additional officers, even if the bill should not provide that.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair has already suggested.

Mr. McKEE. Could not the same amendments be put into other bills?

The SPEAKER. They would not be germane. Any bill that can be considered in the House, as against the point that it should go to the Committee of the Whole, cannot have a germane amendment made to it appropriating money. The point is whether, if this bill is allowed to be considered in the House, an amendment affixing different salaries to the offices from what the committee proposes is not germane. The Chair does not wish to put himself in this attitude, that a bill shall be considered in the House, as against the point that it should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, and then exclude an amendment which would be obviously a germane amendment to the bill. Suppose for one moment—and the Chair invites the attention of the chairman of the committee to this—suppose for one moment that, where a bill reports certain fees and emoluments to be allowed to the assistant attorney, some gentleman proposes double those fees and emoluments, on what ground can the Chair rule that out as an amendment not germane?

Mr. McKEE. Then I contend that in all cases we shall have a strict construction of this rule.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair has been trying to do for the past three months—to give a very strict construction to the rule. And the Chair begs the attention of the House to this point, that any bill which may be legitimately considered in the House, as against the point that it shall go to the Committee of the Whole, cannot have a germane amendment appropriating money or property, and any amendment of that nature would therefore be ruled out at once. And that is one of the touch-stones whereby to test the rule, that if a bill, even against the apparent wording of the text, is open to a germane amendment, making an appropriation, the bill becomes obnoxious to the point of order.

Mr. McKEE. Then we can hardly introduce any bill that touches in any way upon any office but it may be ruled that it shall go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The rule simply is, that the Committee of the Whole shall first discuss the bill. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McKEE] will observe that this is merely as to the process, the parliamentary process, not affecting the merits of the bill at all. The Chair has no right to rule, and does not desire to rule in any way at all, touching the provisions of a bill. He merely rules as to the parliamentary process to which it shall be subjected. And the Chair thinks, after having looked at the matter carefully, that this bill is unquestionably liable to the point of order, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CROUNSE. I propose to move a substitute for the bill when it is considered in Committee of the Whole, and I ask that the substitute, which I send to the desk, may be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] is entitled to the floor on the transportation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the indulgence of the gentleman from Kentucky, while I inquire of the House whether an arrangement can be made for taking up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill? I do not wish to interrupt the progress of the debate on the transportation bill, and least of all would I desire to interfere, in any way, with the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky. But I am desirous that the House will fix a period, either to-day or to-morrow morning, when we may take up the legislative appropriation bill. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, at the conclusion of the morning hour, that bill shall be made the special order.

Mr. RANDALL. I must object to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand there are two gentlemen who wish to speak on the bill pending to-day, and I think after they have been heard we may proceed to take up the legislative appropriation bill to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill in relation to the distribution of documents comes up to-morrow morning. I have no objection to the legislative appropriation bill being taken up after that is disposed of.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the bill to which the gentleman alludes is taken up to-morrow it will run through the whole day.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. STONE, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2342) for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Railways and Canals, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. POLAND. The supply of copies of the bankruptcy bill having become exhausted, I ask that, by unanimous consent, the bill be reprinted—the usual number of copies.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask that the bill be made a special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union after the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. COBURN. I would inquire for what time the legislative bill has been fixed?

The SPEAKER. Not for any time; but the gentleman from Iowa asks that this bill shall be made a special order after that bill is disposed of. It is rather an indefinite way of making a special order, but it will come up some time. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and the order will be made.

IMPROVEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, if I can obtain the floor, I shall move to suspend the rules, to have taken from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union Senate bill No. 360, in regard to the improvement of the Capitol grounds.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire unanimous consent of the House to allow us to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the special consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill to-morrow, at the end of the morning hour, for general debate only.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask two questions of the Chair. The first is, what the effect of that motion will be upon the motion to reconsider, entered by the gentleman from Indian, [Mr. SHANKS,] in reference to the bill for the distribution of documents, &c.? And the other question is, what effect this motion would have on Friday; whether the appropriation bill would override private bills?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, who entered the motion to reconsider, could not call it up in opposition to the transportation bill now pending in the House. The transportation bill was made, under a suspension of the rules, which suspended the rule giving a motion to reconsider privilege, a special order in the House after half-past one o'clock, and the motion to reconsider cannot come in conflict with that. It may be called up immediately after the reading of the Journal, and may be considered until half-past one o'clock, or it may be called up immediately after the transportation bill is disposed of. It does not lose its privilege by not being called up on the day on which the gentleman gave notice he would call it up.

Mr. RANDALL. My second question is whether this order will interfere with private bills on Friday?

The SPEAKER. It could not interfere with private bills unless the House by a majority vote should refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and then the Chair would entertain a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to inquire whether the currency bill was not fixed for the 11th?

The SPEAKER. Yes; on Monday last the House fixed that the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency should be considered on the 11th instant, which is Wednesday of next week, at half-past one o'clock, to the exclusion of all other orders. It will then be taken up unless this transportation bill should not be disposed of. If it is not disposed of at that date, it will take precedence of the currency bill; but the currency bill will come up immediately after it is disposed of.

Mr. COBURN. But if the legislative bill is taken up under this order, will it supersede that?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. The currency bill is in the House, and the appropriation bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to state, before this order is made, that my colleague on the Committee on Elections, from Missouri, [Mr. HYDE,] is instructed by the committee to call up the contested-election case from the first district of Georgia to-morrow.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will let that pass over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to have reference merely to some general debate on the appropriation bill, not anticipating or asking any action on it.

Mr. RANDALL. Would not the precedence given to the transportation bill under a suspension of the rules interfere also with the election case in like manner?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. McCRARY. If the House gives this unanimous consent, when will the transportation bill again come before the House?

The SPEAKER. The very next day. The Chair will remark, however, that the transportation bill holds its place subject to the House going into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say that I do not desire to interfere with that bill.

The SPEAKER. If a majority of the House to-morrow sustain the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to go into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill, they can do so; that was made an exception.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make an arrangement now, so that gentlemen who wish to speak may have notification, and therefore I make the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can give notice that at half-past one to-morrow he will make his motion. He has a right to make it. Is there objection to making this arrangement? If there be none, the House will to-morrow, at half-past one o'clock, go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, for debate only.

Mr. WOLFE. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I shall make the motion to-morrow.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1385) reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals to regulate commerce by railroads in the several States, upon which Mr. ARTHUR was entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCRARY. Before the gentleman from Kentucky proceeds, I ask consent that he may occupy the same time I did, which will exceed his hour.

There was no objection.

Mr. ARTHUR then resumed and concluded his speech commenced yesterday. It will be found in full in the Appendix.

Mr. HURLBUT obtained the floor and yielded to Mr. DONNAN.

PRINTING EXTRA NUMBER OF BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. DONNAN. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I am instructed by that committee to report back a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk with an amendment.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House one thousand extra copies of House bill No. 792, to repeal an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, the number already printed being exhausted.

The amendment reported from the committee was to strike out the last clause of the resolution, "the number already printed being exhausted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon the resolution as amended.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Before the resolution is adopted, I desire to say that there should be more printed than it provides for. There are three hundred members of this House, and I myself have applications for one dozen copies of this bill. I would suggest that there should be at least two thousand copies printed.

Mr. DONNAN. There have been already five thousand copies of this bill printed. The committee believe, under the instructions of the House, that it is their duty to be as economical as possible in the matter of printing.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. This is a very important bill, and it will cost but little more to print two thousand than one thousand copies.

Mr. SPEER. I introduced this resolution, and I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DONNAN. The committee have no objections to the House enlarging as much as they please. They report back the original resolution.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move to increase the number to two thousand copies.

Mr. SPEER, I hope that amendment will prevail.

Mr. CESSNA. I hope the amendment will not be insisted upon. This bill, with the Senate amendment, is now before the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, and is being amended very considerably, and will be much more before we are done with it; so that when it comes before the House the additional number now to be ordered will be of little or no use to members. It is not probable the bill will pass in its present shape, and if any extra copies are to be printed, let them be ordered when the bill shall come from the committee.

Mr. DONNAN. The committee believe that one thousand additional copies, furnishing three to each member, will be sufficient.

Mr. WILBER. What will we do, then, when we have letters from our constituents calling for these bills?

Mr. DONNAN. Do as we do about the Agricultural Reports; do without them.

Mr. POTTER. I think a reasonable number with the Senate amendments should be printed, for we have calls for the bill in that form.

Mr. WILBER. If the committee think it so expensive to the Government, I will myself pay one-half of the additional expense.

The question was taken upon the amendment increasing the number to two thousand copies; and it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 20, noes not counted.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroad among the several States.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker, I pray the attention of the House to the remarks which I feel called upon to make at this time; first, in consideration of the magnitude of the subject and the vastness of the interests that are involved in this proposition; and, second, on account of the claim of the great masses of the people of the United States for legislation of this kind. I am aware that we are approaching a test vote in this House upon a proposition which is novel in its terms. It is an extension of a well-known, thoroughly understood power of this Government, belonging to it under the express terms of the Constitution, in a mode and in a form which have not yet been considered by the country.

If I understand the force of the argument which has been made upon the other side by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] the great objection that he finds is that this power in this form has never hitherto been exercised. But powers and occasions for their exercise are different things. The occasion comes in the ordinary flow of events; the power given by the Constitution, or inherent in the State, in the case of a State, is exercised when the exigency presents itself. Then, so far from that being an objection, it is simply proof of the fact that this Constitution of ours was created by men so thoroughly imbued with the profound wisdom of the old common law that in accordance with the teachings of that law they prescribed certain great general principles which fit themselves to and apply to all the various circumstances which arise within the limits of the life of a nation. That, sir, is the great glory of the common law; it is the great glory of the Constitution. It is not a Constitution of enumerations of occasions under which power may be exercised. But it consists of grants of power; and the occasion for the exercise of power is to be determined by the body who are intrusted with that power.

It seemed to me, as I heard my silvery-tongued friend from Kentucky discourse upon this question, that there was some slight echo of that wretched old heresy of extravagant State sovereignty breaking out once in a while in his discourse. I had hoped that that thing was dead; that that extreme adoration of the State organization, and placing it in antagonism to the national authority, had been wiped out by the course of events which have transpired within these last twelve years. I know, sir, that from the foundation of this Government there have existed two sets of ideas with regard to the power of the national Government, which have been in conflict during all that time; and I know, sir, that it was the conflict of those two ideas, and nothing else, that brought about that arbitrament by which the nation through war, the last, final, fatal appeal, was consolidated, and brought out, no longer a mere raft of ill-assorted logs floating at random down the stream of time, but alive, instinct with life all through—a thing of life and power and command. And to us standing here now, remembering where we are and who we are, it seems plain duty to consider carefully, not whether we run against some old, exploded theory of special, peculiar State sovereignty, but whether honestly and in good faith we can carry out by this or any other kindred measure the great purpose for which the Constitution was made.

The gentleman from Kentucky said wisely and well that the rule of construction with regard to the Constitution (he might have said the same as to all other legal language) was to consider the words in connection with the circumstances surrounding the men who used the words, construing the enactment in reference to the evils sought to be removed or the good sought to be achieved. Now, sir, I hold that same doctrine. I hold that this Constitution of ours starts off with a declaration of the objects for which it was formed, the occasions which called it into being; and I find declared as those objects "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare."

Now, sir, the Constitution and the laws made under it do not act through any intervening bodies; they strike straight down upon the individual citizen. The laws of the United States, if shaped in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, act by their own force, vitality, and vigor upon each and every individual citizen or interest or growth of the entire country.

This power to regulate commerce as given in the Constitution is comprehended in but a few words; yet look how vast it is:

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Mr. NIBLACK. Does the gentleman claim that that clause in the Constitution has been in any way affected by the late war?

Mr. HURLBUT. No, sir; but it has been wonderfully well enforced. [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. If it has not been affected in any way, why do not the old rules still apply to it?

Mr. HURLBUT. I am applying the old rules to it. I hope to convince the gentleman before I get through that the old rules are the safe rules; and that there is no novel proposition of law in this bill.

Now, sir, under that simple clause of two lines and a half, as carried into operation by beneficent laws issuing from the Congress of the United States, our commerce by land and by water has developed itself. It is the fashion of some people to suppose that navigable waters are valuable simply because they are navigable. But the mere navigation is nothing. The point on which this jurisdiction of the United States applies to all the waters within our limits, is that those waters are capable of bearing and do bear commerce.

Nor does it make any difference in what mode, in what form, by what vehicle, by what contrivance of human ingenuity the commerce contemplated by that provision is carried on; the jurisdiction of Congress under the Constitution attaches to, and inheres in, the subject-matter; it pursues, controls, protects, guides, limits that commerce, without reference to the mode in which it is carried on. Thus, sir, every movement of our industry throughout this entire Union, the transportation of our vast productions of cereals in the West, which seek markets among the manufacturing and commercial people of the East, and the returns which come from the East and flow to the West; all the trade which moves upon the Mississippi and its vast tributaries; everything that in any manner or form comes properly within the language, "commerce among the States," falls necessarily under, and is subject to, the control of the Congress of the United States by virtue of this grant.

But, sir, there are other reasons why we should consider this, independently of its magnitude. In this Government of ours, if I understand it at all, (and I have tried to,) there is only one sovereign thing in these United States, and that is the deliberate and lawfully declared will of the people of the United States. All these other forms, laws, constitutions, judicial determinations, are and must be, in the very nature of our Government, subjected to and controllable by that deliberate and settled public will. It may take time to do it; it takes time to change our Constitution; but the people are able to do it and have done it. It does not take so long a time to change the laws of Congress. There are gentlemen here who have witnessed this year with what rapidity they have been able to change at this session a law passed at the last. But in whatever mode this public opinion seeks to express itself, however long and however circuitous the route may be, if once the people of these United States deliberately assume for themselves to decide that a certain thing shall be done, it simply must be done; it is the inevitable necessity of a government based on such a foundation as ours.

Now, sir, that this measure is demanded by the great mass of the working people of the nation, by the great mass of the producing elements of the nation, the statistics of this country fairly and unquestionably show.

I now, Mr. Speaker, propose to consider for a little while the precise legal status of a railway and a railway company under the laws of the States first——

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HURLBUT. I presume I will.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understand the gentleman to state our form of government is subject to the will of the people.

Mr. HURLBUT. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. However long it may take, the people can and will ultimately have their will through the Constitution. Now, sir, I suppose this bill, on his own construction, is not an amendment to the Constitution; and it seems to me the gentleman evades or passes by the real question, which is, whether under the existing Constitution, under the expressed will of the people, in the only manner in which they can express their will—whether under that, this bill which the gentleman is advocating, is in accordance with that will of the people; whether its provisions are constitutional, or, in other words, whether they are in accordance with the will of the people in the Constitution?

Mr. HURLBUT. I think I understand the gentleman's question. I think I shall answer it before I get through. I am obliged to my friend for the interruption, for it gave me an opportunity to rest.

Now, sir, it is essential to this question, as I understand it, to arrive at some definite legal conclusion as to the precise status in law of a railroad company. My friend from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] who opened this discussion, stated and proved that a railroad was not only a public highway, but it was also a common carrier. But a railroad differs from an ordinary common carrier in a most important particular, and the thing which has been relied on by the courts of every State of this Union which have yet passed on this question, in order to sustain the jurisdiction of the State over these roads, is this, that no railroad is constructed without having given to it by the State the exercise of the very highest attribute of sovereignty; that no railroad is built except by the use or abuse, as it sometimes is, of the great prerogative of eminent domain. Now, sir, if anything is more dear to this American people than another, it is the sanctity of title in land. The doctrine which we derive from our English fathers, that a man's house is his castle, is extended to the ownership of land; and there is nothing so jealously watched by this people as this imprescriptible right of every citizen to hold his land free from interference. And yet, sir, in the exercise of this great prerogative of eminent domain these railroads, creatures of the State, corporations established by it, come along and remorselessly, without my consent, take from me just so much as they deem necessary of my land, keeping in view, of course, compensation. Without that power they could not buy their way through.

I will quote authority, and beg particular attention of gentlemen on the other side of this question, because I intend to show the same principles which apply to the jurisdiction over these railroads of the several States, in regard to internal commerce, apply with equal force to the jurisdiction of Congress over interstate commerce, which the States cannot regulate or control. The first case I will read to the House probably condenses the whole doctrine on this subject in as short, compact, and careful a form as any.

I will read from The Louisville, Cincinnati and Charleston Railroad Company vs. Chappell, 1 Rice, South Carolina Reports, page 398—a report now something over forty years of age. The court say, per Richardson, J.:

> Such a railroad as ours should be held as a highway on account of its great objects, and for the same reasons to be kept under public control. Is it not wise to hold such a company as the guardians or lessees of a great highway, endowed with a public franchise, yet subject to the control which their purposes indicate as necessary and proper for such an establishment, and which the general right to use the road absolutely requires? Such a road must be held as a part of the public domain, farmed out to individual men for its practical administration and order alone; and if placed aloof from such control, it would inevitably become suspected of partiality, and odious to the people.

The next which I will ask the attention of the House to is Railroad Company vs. Davis, 2 Devereux & Battle, North Carolina Reports, page 469. The court say:

> The general management has been left to individuals whose private interests prompt them to conduct it beneficially to the public; but it is not wholly confided to them. From the nature of their undertaking and the character of the work, they are under sufficient responsibilities to insure the construction and preservation of the work, which is the great object of the Government. The public interest and control are neither destroyed nor suspended. The control continues as far as it is consistent with the interests granted, and in all cases as far as may be necessary to the public use. The road is a highway, although the tolls may be private property by force of the grant of the franchise to collect them. * * * As to the corporation, it is a franchise, like a ferry or any other; as to the public, it is a highway, and in the strictest sense publici juris.

That is another case thirty-five years old.

In 20 New York Reports, page 131, case of Vedder vs. Fellows, the court, by Strong, J., say:

> The railroads are public institutions, established by law for public accommodation. They have, except where they adjoin or are near navigable rivers, superseded all other extensive ways of conveyance, and have thus rendered travelers and owners of freight in a great measure dependent upon their means of locomotion. The companies have thus public duties to perform, and they ought not to, and in my opinion they cannot legally, subject either passengers or freight-owners to regulations that are palpably unreasonable.

The same doctrine is repeated in the case of Sanford against a railroad company, (34 Pennsylvania Reports, pages 380, 381,) and the decision goes a little further than the other:

> The right to take tolls is a compensation to be received for the benefits conferred. If the public are entitled to these advantages, it results from the nature of the right the benefits should be extended to all alike, and that no special privilege should be granted to one man or set of men and denied to others.

So, in Essex and Northeast Railroad Company vs. Casey, (26 Pennsylvania Reports, pages 307, 308,) the court, by Justice Black, says:

> Railroads made by the authority of the Commonwealth, upon land taken under her right of eminent domain, and established by her laws as thoroughfares for the commerce that passes through her borders, are her highways. No corporation has any property in them, though corporations may have franchises annexed to and exercisable within them.

Now, sir, I affirm that under the grant given in the Constitution the Congress of the United States has at least the same power as to interstate commerce as the States have as to internal commerce by railway—at least that.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] seems to think it an unheard-of thing that any sovereignty, State or national, should interfere with wages demanded for service or prices of labor or articles.

The gentleman has surely forgotten the almost innumerable instances in which States have done it, and are now doing it. Let me refresh his memory with a few instances in point.

In the People vs. Mayor of New York, (32 Barbour,) the city of New York was the owner of certain ferries by grant, which constituted a contract; but the court said:

> In regard to ferries, there is a still further right which the public may exercise, to wit, the right of regulating the rates of ferriage, and of so controlling ferry franchises and privileges in the hands of grantees or lessees that they shall not be abused to the serious detriment or inconvenience of the public.

Most cities limit the charges of hackmen, and although the hackman pays a license fee for his privileges, the rates may be, and often are, reduced upon him without his consent. The hackman is a common carrier as well as the railroad; his occupation is as honest, and of equal dignity in law, although not of such controlling importance. Why does the law interfere with the hackman as to the price of his labor?

A common mill to grind grain is a general convenience, and the occupation is honest; but all the States, so far as I know, limit the tolls to be taken for work done, and compel the miller to take the grain in the order in which it is delivered.

Some of the States limit the charges of innkeepers, a provision much to be desired in Washington. Some, again, fix the fees of lawyers and physicians. Nearly all fix a rate of interest, and thus limit the honest trade of money-lending. All these are limitations on the right of the citizen to do what he pleases with his own.

Consider again the assize of bread, by which bakers are required by law to make bread of a certain weight for a certain price, according to the price of flour.

All these limitations are as old in many instances as the common law itself, and depend upon the right and duty of government to protect the people against imposition and extortion.

If, then, the power of Congress over interstate commerce is equal to the power of the State over strictly State commerce, it is only sought to apply by this bill a principle familiar to the legislation of the State in a similar subject-matter.

Does the gentleman object to the act of Congress limiting the fees of attorneys in pension cases? This stands on the same ground of preventing imposition. But I have not time to pursue the subject by looking up the many important points in which Congress has limited the action of common carriers by water in favor of life and security.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] in reading the case of Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge Company, one of the cases on which our side, perhaps mistakenly, relied, commented upon the facts in the case.

Now I have lived, sir, long enough in the West to see this entire system of railroads grow up. I saw the first pioneer road from Chicago to the prairies of Illinois more than thirty years ago; and in that period of time I have seen this vast net-work of railways grow to proportions which, in that State, overshadow and utterly put out of sight any other means of conveyance, or any other means of commerce.

When it was first sought to extend these railroads across the Mississippi River, I can recollect very well, and so will some of my friends who are here from Missouri, the outcry that went up from that State against the first establishment of a bridge across the great navigable highway of the West. Gradually the courts of the country and the public opinion of the country recognized this great fact, that the railroads were in fact developing for themselves a controlling position as channels of commerce. And so the court in the case of Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge Company ruled, and ruled correctly, that the great railroad and great river met on terms of absolute equality; that though not dreamed of by the wildest imagination at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, yet when it came to crossing the great navigable waters of the Mississippi River, the railroad had become so completely an element of commerce as to have precisely equal rights with the river.

Now, if that is conceded—and such is the clear law and clear fact—it settles the question whether or not these railways have become and are now channels of a portion of the commerce of our country. If so, then the provision of the Constitution inures to the commerce moving over those roads as thoroughly, as completely, and to the same extent, as it applies to any other mode or channel of commerce.

Now, sir, the common carrier who builds his boat on the Mississippi River and runs down that great stream does not come to the Legislature and ask for the exercise of this high prerogative of eminent domain. He stands simply on his common-law position as a common carrier; and through his distance, therefore, from the governing power, his chances of being controlled by the governing power are all the further and the more remote from the fact that he is not in the exercise of any special privilege and special grant for which the Government is responsible, and the grant of which makes him a public officer.

In support of this proposition, Mr. Speaker, I desire to state, for the consideration of the House, some figures which have been collated with a good deal of care from the reports of the various boards of trade of this country; which will show how the matter stands as regards the actual transfer and movement of commerce over those lines, especially in that portion of the country which I am most familiar with. I would state that it appears from these collated tables that a trifle more than thirty-one million tons were moved from the West to the East and back by all the great lines of communication by land and water.

Now, sir, out of that thirty-one millions of tons, the Erie Canal, which is the only means of communication directly competing with the railroads in the State of New York, transported only about six millions, and the balance of all that vast movement lay in the hands, under the control, and subject to the charges of these great corporations. It is certain, Mr. Speaker, that if we do not regulate these railways they will simply regulate us. If we neglect the duty which I believe is borne in upon this Congress of taking charge of and correcting the unreasonable rates that have been laid upon the movements of commerce by the railways, they will continue to do what they have done for the last eight years. I remember very well that there was a time in the State of New York when two men sought to control all the great railway lines across that State—that was in the palmy days of Fisk and Gould. They stole the Erie Railroad, and with the stealings that they made by the misuse of the property originally stolen, they sought to buy the other great competing line. The brain of that partnership survives; the blackguard body of it is dead; but the brain of it, in the person of Gould, was guilty of one tremendous blunder when, in answering a question of a committee of the house of representatives of the State of New York, he allowed the expression to drop from his lips that, with the control of the New York Central added to the control he already had over the Erie, he could sit down at his breakfast table and mark down or mark up the prices of all commodities. Now, sir, that proposition stands true to-day.

I am not here to arraign the management of these great roads. I do not consider it criminal in men to take advantage of their position and of the necessities of the country to accumulate vast fortunes. I am not here to cast any reflections upon the growth of these great railroad systems of our country. I know by my own personal experience and observation how far they have already developed and made possible the improvement of large portions of our country which otherwise, by the common means of transit, we might not have reached for half a century. But power, to whomsoever given, has its limits. Why, sir, we heard from my friend from Kentucky the dangers of the powers exercised by Congress. He pointed out to you eloquently the dangers to come to individual, civil, and political liberty in this country by assuming to carry out what is sought by this bill. But, sir, in that measure there is no real danger; there is no danger so great to the industrial interests of this country, there is no danger so great to the political morality of this country, as the uncontrolled dominion of these gigantic corporations. Why, sir, ten men if they choose to unite, as they generally do, can take off one-third or one-half of all the productive industries of my own State.

Now, sir, I do not choose to confess, as gentlemen seem to do, that this Government of ours is so absolute a failure that we cannot grapple with and constitutionally grapple with and fairly control, all things which tend to the common benefit within the powers given to us under the Constitution. My friend from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] in opening this debate, read some very well considered remarks from Mr. Adams, who unquestionably has given this subject a great deal of consideration, and very careful and patient consideration. It all resolves itself back again into that same argument, that same plain, homely, common-sense saying of the old English engineer, George Stephenson, which was also quoted by the gentleman from Iowa, that competition is an impossibility where combination is possible. Tell me, sir, where combination is not possible. Remember that these great systems of roads are stretching out farther and farther through the country. They are seeking to bring in new tributaries, to gain new powers. I remember it being stated—it may possibly have been one of the scandals of the day—that even during the palmy time of unchecked railroad management in New York, it not only controlled the Legislature, but that it owned the courts. Now, sir, the courts have escaped from all domination. The courts of the country are now prepared, in obedience to the will of the people, to hold to rigid account these public stewards, because that is all they are; they are simply certain trustees to whom the State has given rights; to whom, in the language of Judge Redfield, it has farmed out a part of the national domain; public officers; and the courts are now prepared to hold them responsible under the common law, in case they violate their duty or enter into improper combinations; liable, as I fully believe the law to be, to indictment for such combinations; liable to mandamus if they neglect these public duties; liable to the actions of private individuals for any abuse which they may have committed.

But, sir, in practice—and I speak from some knowledge on the subject—this right of private action which exists everywhere against corporations having this prerogative and performing these duties, is nugatory in the hands of an individual. I will state the reason why, because I have lived in the country where this fight has been going on for about ten years.

In the first place, the producers are never shippers. The farmer brings his grain or his produce down to the small depot, where he sells it to the commission man. The commission man is in the daily habit of passing his produce forward over the road. Then an extravagant toll is taken from the commission man first, of course indirectly from the producer. But that commission man dare not for the life of him bring an action against the railroad company. Why, sir, in my own town where I live, seventy-five miles from the city of Chicago, the regular charge nowadays on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad for the transportation of grain is fifteen cents per bushel for that seventy-five miles. Yet from Omaha, four hundred and twenty miles farther west, grain passing right by our doors is brought to Chicago at the same charge per bushel.

Now, to the plain, bucolic mind, the granger mind, if gentlemen so please to call it, that is the statement of a proposition which is manifestly unjust. And even if a man be so elevated above the common plane of ordinary suffering humanity, which sends us here to this House, no matter how high he may elevate himself in his own judgment, that simple statement of fact is in itself evidence of a gross and palpable injustice, inequality, and wrong committed. And I could give many such instances as that.

Now, I believe, as law, that the State has ample power, within her own limits and in matters of commerce that only move from one point within her boundaries to another, to control all this question. I admit that. But the State has no power to touch, determine, limit, or in any way control, commerce which is moving across her borders, by a contract made beyond her limits, and to be completed in another State on the other side of her borders. Therefore, unless the Congress of the United States assumes this jurisdiction of interstate commerce, there exists no power under heaven that can do it.

Take the State of Illinois, for instance. It lies like a wedge, extending from Lake Michigan, on the north, down to the Ohio River. Across her limits flows eastward all the commerce that moves by rail of the whole country beyond. It is the outlet for all of it. Now, sir, we are trying to establish, and we have established, the proposition of State control by constitutional enactment; we are trying to control, and we will control, no matter how long the fight may last, these corporations within our own State as to their movements within the State. But just across our limits, on the other side of the Mississippi, is the great city of Saint Louis, desiring to send vast amounts of commercial commodities East, and receiving large contributions from the East. I affirm, as a settled principle of law, that any contract made in Saint Louis for the delivery in New York, by railroad, of commercial productions, is wholly and absolutely beyond the control of the State of Illinois. We cannot touch it.

Gentlemen perhaps have forgotten what they have done themselves here within a short time. So great was the necessity in one case which arose, and which the older members of this House, those who were here in 1866, will remember; so urgent and compulsory was the necessity in the case of the Camden and Amboy Railroad and the State of New Jersey, that the Congress of the United States, not in a hurry, not hastily, but after a debate which extended through the whole of one session and occupied part of another, did actually take hold squarely and strongly of this system of roads created by State authority, and passed an act which is to be found on page 66 of the pamphlet laws of 1866. That act provides—

> That every railroad company whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby authorized to carry upon and over its road, boats, bridges, and ferries, all passengers, troops, Government supplies, mails, freight, and property on their way through one State to another, and to receive compensation therefor, and to connect with roads of other States so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination.

Now, that act is manifestly necessary. It is true that the line of border between any two States is a mathematical line. But it is equally true that in contemplation of law there is a gap, a solution of continuity, between a road chartered by one State and a road chartered by the adjoining State. And this was made a general law. In the first sessions where it was pending, the objection was made to it that it was intended to be a law specifically aimed at a particular road and a particular State. And so it was made general. And under that law every connection that is made by roads of conterminous States arriving at the boundary and intended to be continuing lines are legalized and justified; and no State can now pass any law which shall prohibit the continuous transportation of merchandise over these roads.

But the Congress of the United States has done more than that. I take it that if there is any right which the common carrier, the railroad man, or anybody else has, according to the theory of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] it is to determine for himself how he will do his own business; that is an axiom.

But, sir, I find a law passed at the third session of the Forty-second Congress, entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation within the United States." That act, among other things, provides that—

No railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle are transported, shall confine the same in cars, boats, or other vessels for a longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours.

I do not intend to read the whole law; but it provides a penalty for the offense thus defined. Now, sir, I do not see any difference in principle between one kind of regulation and another.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move that the gentleman's time be extended. He evidently has not got nearly through his argument.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BURROWS in the chair.) If there be no objection the gentleman's time will be extended.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HURLBUT. Granted once the power, granted once that the Constitution confers upon this body the power to regulate this subject-matter, and you are concluded inevitably to the ruling laid down by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons vs. Ogden, that for the purposes for which that power was given and in the execution of the power conferred by the Constitution the jurisdiction of Congress is "plenary." I beg gentlemen to remember that if there was ever a man in the world that understood the weight and the power of words it was Judge Marshall. When he said "plenary" he meant that all power was vested. When the Pope of Rome claims for himself plenary jurisdiction, all Catholics believe it; and all heretics like myself, whether they believe it or not, know what he means. You cannot get up as strong a combination of words to express the idea of unbounded authority as those words, "plenary jurisdiction." But Chief Justice Marshall does not stop there. After saying that the power granted is plenary, he says that the only control that can by any possibility be given, and the only control upon which the fathers and framers of the Constitution relied, was that solemn responsibility which each Representative must feel to the people who send him here, and who, by their approval or disapproval, may control his action. Now I do not know any mode in which that proposition can be stated more distinctly, more powerfully, more clearly, more absolutely.

But, sir, I come back now to consider this question in the light in which my friend from Kentucky himself put it. He said, if I heard him correctly, (I regret that I had not an opportunity to hear perhaps all that he did say, yet I believe I got the line of his argument upon that subject,) that taking into consideration as the rule of construction of the language of the Constitution the evils that were sought to be removed, it was found upon an examination of contemporaneous documents that the evil sought to be remedied was the restriction upon commerce. Now, if that gentleman or any other will tell me a greater restriction that can be imposed upon interstate commerce than unreasonable and oppressive charges on that commerce, I wish to know what it is. The courts of the United States have held that the State cannot impose restrictions upon interstate commerce. Is it assumed that a corporation, the creature of the State, can do in substance and by indirection what the State that created it cannot do directly and by law? Can it be that the creature has grown to be, as many people affirm, a great deal more important, more controlling, and more powerful than the creator? Is it true that all our legislation has simply ended, like the experiment of the student in that horrible novel of Frankenstein, in our creating out of these dead things around us an instrument of evil and mischief and power enough to destroy and overthrow and tear to pieces, and which we are not able to control? I do not believe any such doctrine. I surrender no such right; and on behalf of myself and my people I affirm that if this national Government, in the exercise of a power given to it in terms in the Constitution, cannot so control these overgrown, gigantic corporations of its own manufacture and its own creation, than this Government has become a failure.

I have tried to show (with what success it is not for me to say) that the power of controlling this interstate commerce belongs here—in the first place, from necessity, because the States individually cannot exercise it; and in the next place from the inconvenience of any other mode of exercise than by congressional authority. Why, sir, if you admit for one moment the doctrine that each particular State can have a right to determine for itself the burdens that it will impose upon the commerce of its sister States passing over its borders, you relapse at once into all the evils which made the old Confederation so hateful, and which compelled and commanded the adoption of our present Constitution.

It thus appearing from the necessity of the case; from the inconvenience and evils resulting from any other construction; from the positive, clear, and undeniable terms of the Constitution; from the deliberate exposition of the highest courts in the nation, that unlimited, plenary, absolute jurisdiction over this question is vested in Congress, its seems scarcely possible that by any quibble or device, by any apprehension of possible failure in the body of men who are to be selected, or from any other cause, this Congress should hesitate long in carrying out this great remedial process.

I think I heard my friend from Kentucky, in the latter part of his speech, making all those charges which it is necessary and proper and customary for a minority man to make against the majority. That is all right; we expect it. He says that the appointment of the commissioners provided for in this bill must be vested in somebody; but, sir, the Constitution vests it in the President, and the bill conforms to that direction. The President has his duty to perform. He may perform it wisely or he may not; that is a thing I do not care to look into or prognosticate about. I presume and expect he will perform it fairly, honestly, and justly; but whether he shall appoint men of such undeniable character, reputation, and position as to make success certain, or whether he may, by ignorance, accident, or anything else, appoint inferior men, is for him to determine The President must act, and will act, upon his own responsibility in the performance of his constitutional duty. We must act, in our sphere, upon our responsibility in the performance of our constitutional duty.

The simple question is whether it is our duty so to act; whether this is an evil existing in the country over which we have power. You cannot deny the existence of the evil. There comes up from every part of this country a sound of warning which I pray gentlemen to consider. It may take—it has taken, in some instances and in some places—an absurd form of protest, a rash, wild character of demonstration; but the very fact that all the country is moved throughout its whole wide extent, from California to the Atlantic, the very fact these feverish symptoms are existing, the very fact that they break out in these demonstrations as constitutional disturbance in the body breaks out in carbuncles and boils, all indicate distinctly and correctly a clear, manifest, deep-seated sense in the people of injustice suffered and tolerated. And I say no government, no administration, no party, no Congress has the right to disregard these symptoms of great constitutional disturbance in the body-politic.

The basis, the whole stimulant, is right here in the excessive, destructive charges which are imposed on the industry of the country. I have seen the corn of my own State, within the last year, offered in the markets at from twenty to twenty-five cents a bushel, nine hundred miles from New York, when it stood in New York at from eighty to ninety. The damage is not only in the value of the article actually destroyed by excessive charges, but in the variability of prices. No man, farmer, commission man, or anybody else, knows what the price is going to be. I have the report of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, which shows that the rate of transportation of wheat to New York from the city of Chicago averaged during the last year thirty-two cents a bushel, and that instantly upon the closing of navigation, when the competition of the lakes and canals died out, it went from thirty to forty-five cents a bushel.

Nor is this evil merely loss to the farmer and the purchaser, but it is a loss to every character of industry everywhere all over the country. They tell me in the Southern Gulf States corn is in eager demand at one dollar a bushel, yet five hundred miles only separate that country from the very heart and center of the corn-growing districts. Is it right such inequality should exist if within our power to correct it?

I would go on with illustration after illustration on this question, but I will take leave, with the consent of the House, to print the tables to which I refer, only recapitulating the results.

At this very season, in ten States which we call the Northwestern States, from the last season there has accumulated of surplus production more than all the channels now in existence can take away. There is a pressure behind of supply, and the control of the lines of transportation, of all branches taken together, establishes a grinding monopoly. It is impossible, in the nature of things, to have competition. The gentlemen who control the great trunk railroads can put their heads together and mark up or mark down the price of corn and all that depends on corn, and mark up or mark down wheat and all that depends on wheat, in that whole region of country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to detain the House any longer, except to enforce upon them, if I can in the few moments I have left, the necessity, the paramount and controlling, necessity of acting at once. And I wish it distinctly understood, as one of the members of this committee and as a Representative in Congress upon this floor, that I have no sort of shadow of fear of assuming a far wider control over this matter than is proposed by this bill. I commit no one else, but speak fearlessly for myself upon this subject. I believe wherever the commerce of this country moves, which can properly be denominated interstate commerce, the controlling hand of the Government of the United States can be laid upon it. I believe every State and every State institution is subordinate to that control, so far as interstate commerce is concerned. I believe that every ferry, and railroad, and canal which is made a part or a link in this great system of interstate commerce is, by the express terms of the Constitution of the United States, subject in all respects to the control of the Congress of the United States.

I take my position in this regard upon the laws and the authorities which I have already read.

I believe for myself that it is wise and proper; and, sir, I know no reason—I have heard none advanced—why there should be any self-imposed limitation, any limitation imposed by ourselves upon ourselves in the exercise of this power.

This bill provides only this: It provides that all these corporations created by State authority which are by law common carriers, and which are also by law public highways, and which are also by law agents of the power that made them, exercising a public duty, forming a part of the State or national domain—that all charters that ever have been granted, or that ever may be granted from any State in this Union, are, by the inherent power of the Constitution, subject to the control of Congress whenever that control is exercised, and are granted in the contemplation of the law subject to that control, and subject to that power, so far as they are engaged in interstate commerce. And, for one, I am ready to meet the consequences of that doctrine, and stand on that as I stand on all these other propositions, by the clear and solemn determination of all the courts throughout these United States, including the Supreme Court of the United States.

And, Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor, I may as well express my views as to the extent of this power of Congress. I believe with Justice Miller, in his decision in the Clinton Bridge Company case, that Congress has the power whenever it likes, whenever it sees good occasion to do it, to charter a railroad over and across any State—that if any State sets itself up—avails itself of its local position—to prevent the free flow of the commerce of the country through it, the power granted by the Constitution to Congress can be exercised and should be exercised to open a channel through which that commerce can pass. More than that, sir, I believe that even without that apparent restriction there is a power in Congress, if they wish to exercise it, to create great trunk lines. I do not believe the Government should build them, but that they have the power so to do is as certain as that they have the power to remove obstructions from the mouth of the Mississippi River. In other words, the doctrine as to interstate commerce by railroads is precisely the same as it is as to rivers. Once admit that they are channels of interstate commerce, the power to remove all obstructions that, in their judgment, are in the way of the free exercise of that commerce, is vested in Congress and ought to be carried out as completely as it is in the case of rivers.

Mr. BROMBERG. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. HURLBUT. I will try.

Mr. BROMBERG. Does the gentleman contend that railways are on the same level with rivers, as to the control of Congress?

Mr. HURLBUT. I do, so far as interstate commerce is concerned. I do not know that Congress has anything to do with the petty commerce carried within the limits of a frog-pond of a State. But when it becomes national in its character, whatever passes from one State into another by a line of railroad, by a river, by a lake, or anything else—over that Congress has control.

I can set no barrier to human improvement. I do not know but in the next fifty years some system may be discovered, in the advance of science, that will be as immeasurably superior to the existing railroad as that railroad is to the old-fashioned highway. I do not know but it may be so. But whatever it is, whatever the ingenuity of man may be able to develop in the way of carrying on commerce from one State into another, or across, or through another State, that commerce and the machinery by which it is carried, that form of transportation, whatever it may be, comes necessarily, completely, and unlimitedly under the control of Congress under this clause of the Constitution.

Mr. BROMBERG. Will the gentleman then say that Congress can regulate the trade of a steamship company from New Orleans to New York?

Mr. HURLBUT. I have no doubt it can if it becomes necessary. The gentleman cannot frighten me by any results of logic. When I have laid down a proposition I never go back from the results it involves. Should it become necessary to do so Congress can do it. They can do anything that belongs to the regulation of commerce between the different States.

Mr. BROMBERG. Can Congress control the rate of commission which a factor in Mobile may charge upon the cotton he sends down the Mississippi?

Mr. HURLBUT. If Congress regulates the rate of transportation on your railroads in Alabama and Mississippi, from what I know of them, I think both the factor and the farmer will be better off. But it is hardly necessary to enter upon the point of what may be done in regard to the commission agent. There are, of necessity, certain matters of internal commerce, in regard to which I apprehend no man claims that the jurisdiction of Congress arises. But wherever the thing assumes national proportions; wherever it reaches a position of respectability in amount so as to be more than a merely local affair; wherever it involves a movement from one or more States; wherever the transportation is considerable, and wherever one law and one system of regulation will cover all that class of transportation through the country, that is the test of nationality, as I understand it, from the Constitution and the decisions of the courts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that I shall leave this subject to the consideration of the House, and I do not know, sir, that anything that I could now say would tend at all to add any weight to what I may have said, or, what is of far more consequence, to the success of the right principle in a matter of this importance. And yet I hardly like to leave this question now, without again requesting of the members of this House that they will for themselves examine the plain principles of the Constitution as they are set down in plain words, and the construction upon this subject which has been given by the Supreme Court of the United States, reaffirming, after a lapse of thirty-four or forty years, the same doctrine which all the courts of all the States originally held as to the rights of railroad companies.

Sir, I think I can see that the mere enactment of a law of this kind, the mere assertion on the part of Congress that it can shoulder upon itself the responsibility which is cast upon it under the Constitution; that it will in the interest of labor, of commerce, of civilization, of growth everywhere throughout this vast continent, shake off these fetters and manacles, will do much good. Sir, latterly this great country of ours has lain prostrate, like Gulliver when the Liliputians tied him in his sleep. All sorts of chains, of laws, of usage, of fraud have been heaped upon the limbs of the sleeping giants.

Wealth has been accumulated in private hands within the last twenty years at a rate such as no country ever saw, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred of these colossal fortunes that have been built up, they have been built by the abuses suffered and tolerated up to this time upon the hitherto silent, but now loud-speaking, industries of the country. It is time, sir, that we, as the representatives of the people, should know, and knowing should utter our voice, that there exists nowhere—nowhere, thank God, in the Constitution of the United States, any such contrivance as shall render the whole productive industry of the country subject to the domination, control, and cruel mercies of the speculators in railway bonds, crushing down the industries of the country to make false dividends upon false stock.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor, and said: I yield to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. As there is to be an evening session this evening for the Committee on Revision of the Laws, I now move that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. RAINEY until Tuesday next, on account of sickness in his family; to Mr. DARRALL, for two weeks; and to Mr. RANSIER, for one week, on important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 353) for the relief of David Braden; and

A bill (S. No. 365) for the relief Matthew Woodruff, late sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, and it was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock, p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. We have now reached the chapter on pensions; and in beginning that portion of the work I move to amend section 4759, page 1208, in lines 4 and 5, by striking out the words "by reason of any wound received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "under the conditions therein stated;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4759. Every person specified in the several classes enumerated in the following section who has been, since the 4th day of March, 1861, or who is hereafter disabled under the conditions therein stated, shall, upon making due proof of the fact, according to such forms and regulations as are or may be provided in pursuance of law, be placed on the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive, for a total disability, or a permanent specific disability, such pension as is hereinafter provided in such cases; and for an inferior disability, except in cases of permanent specific disability, for which the rate of pension is expressly provided, an amount proportionate to that provided for total disability; and such pension shall commence as hereinafter provided, and continue during the existence of the disability.

I will state the reason for that amendment. It is simply to avoid repetition. Sections 4759, 4760, and 4761 of this chapter are made from section 1, of the act of March 3, 1873. The only difference is a difference in arrangement and a separation of the several parts of that section. The conditions under which pensions are granted to different classes of pensioners are fully set forth in section 4760.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move to amend section 4760, page 1208, line 10, by striking out the hyphen at the end of the line and inserting a comma; so as to make it read "engineer, sailor, &c." Engineer and sailor are two different words, and are not a compound word.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4761, page 1209, line 5, I move to insert, after the word "wounded" the words "or injured;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4761. No person shall be entitled to a pension by reason of wounds or injury received or disease contracted in the service of the United States subsequent to the 27th day of July, 1868, unless the person who was wounded or injured or contracted the disease was in the line of duty; and, if in the military service, was at the time actually in the field, or on the march, or at some post, fort, or garrison, or en route, by direction of competent authority, to some post, fort, or garrison; or, if in the naval service, was at the time borne on the books of some ship or other vessel of the United States, at sea or in harbor, actually in commission, or was at some naval station, or on his way, by direction of competent authority, to the United States, or to some other vessel or naval station or hospital.

That is the general phraseology, and there is a distinction between the words "wounded" and "injured."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4762, page 1210, line 23, I move to strike out the words "enlisted men," and to insert the words "other persons;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4762. The pension for total disability shall be as follows, namely: For lieutenant-colonel and all officers of higher rank in the military service and in the Marine Corps, and for captain and all officers of higher rank, commander, surgeon, paymaster, and chief engineer, respectively ranking with commander by law, lieutenant commanding and master commanding in the naval service, thirty dollars per month; for major in the military service and in the Marine Corps, and lieutenant, surgeon, paymaster, and chief engineer, respectively ranking with lieutenant by law, and passed assistant surgeon in the naval service, twenty-five dollars per month; for captain in the military service and in the Marine Corps, chaplain in the Army, and provost-marshal, professor of mathematics, master, assistant surgeon, assistant paymaster, and chaplain in the naval service, twenty dollars per month; for first lieutenant in the military service and in the Marine Corps, acting assistant or contract surgeon, and deputy provost-marshal, seventeen dollars per month; for second lieutenant in the military service and in the Marine Corps, first assistant engineer, ensign, and pilot in the naval service, and enrolling officer, fifteen dollars per month; for cadet midshipman, passed midshipman, midshipmen, clerks of admirals and paymasters and of other officers commanding vessels, second and third assistant engineer, master's mate, and all warrant officers in the naval service, ten dollars per month; and for all other persons whose rank or office is not mentioned in this section, eight dollars per month; and the masters, pilots, engineers, sailors, and crews upon the gun-boats and war-vessels shall be entitled to receive the pension allowed herein to those of like rank in the naval service.

The reason for that is that there is a class of pensioners who are not enlisted men.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4763, on page 1210, line 10, I move to strike out the word "so."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4765, page 1211, line 25, I move to insert, after the words "per month," the words "from and after June 4, 1872;" and in line 27, after the words "per month," insert the words "from the same date."

It will be seen from the wording of this section, at the beginning of it, that this class of pensions is intended to date from and after June 4, 1872, and it is, perhaps, important that it should be clearly expressed in the two provisos, especially in view of the act passed March 3, 1873, as some question might arise as to the time of commencement. The undoubted intention was that the pension should begin on the 4th of June, 1872. I move also, in the same section, lines 31 and 32, to strike out the words "provided further that," and begin the word "except" with a capital "E," and make the proviso a separate section. Also, in line 34, after the words "surgeon's certificate," to insert the words "establishing the same made under the pending claim for increase;" also strike out the word "that" in line 34.

The amendments were agreed to.

The section as amended will read as follows:

SEC. 4765. From and after June 4, 1872, all persons entitled by law to a less pension than hereinafter specified, who, while in the military or naval service of the United States, and in line of duty, shall have lost the sight of both eyes, or shall have lost the sight of one eye, the sight of the other having been previously lost, or shall have lost both hands, or shall have lost both feet, or been permanently and totally disabled in the same, or otherwise so permanently and totally disabled as to render them utterly helpless, or so nearly so as to require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person, shall be entitled to a pension of $31.25 per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally and permanently disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to be incapacitated for performing any manual labor, but not so much as to require regular personal aid and attendance, shall be entitled to a pension of twenty-four dollars per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand, or one foot, or been totally and permanently disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to render their incapacity to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or foot, shall be entitled to a pension of eighteen dollars per month: Provided, That all persons who, under like circumstances, have lost a leg above the knee, and in consequence thereof are so disabled that they cannot use artificial limbs, shall be rated in the second class and receive twenty-four dollars per month from and after the 4th of June, 1872; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost the hearing of both ears, shall be entitled to a pension of thirteen dollars per month from the same date: Provided, That the pension for a disability not permanent, equivalent in degree to any provided for in this section, shall, during the continuance of the disability in such degree, be at the same rate as that herein provided for a permanent disability of like degree. Except in cases of permanent specific disabilities, no increase of pension shall be allowed to commence prior to the date of the examining surgeon's certificate, establishing the same, made under the pending claim for increase; and in this as well as all other cases the certificate of an examining surgeon, or of a board of examining surgeons, shall be subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4767, on page 1212, in line 2, I move to strike out the comma and the word "while" after "veteran furlough;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 4767. Officers absent on sick leave, and enlisted men absent on sick furlough, or on veteran furlough with the organization to which they belong, shall be regarded in the administration of the pension laws in the same manner as if they were in the field or hospital.

That amendment, perhaps, needs a little explanation. I had some difficulty in determining the meaning of this section; but I think, by striking out the word "while" and the comma, we get the meaning of the section, "that officers absent on sick leave, enlisted men absent on sick furlough, or on veteran furlough with the organization to which they belong." There should be no separation between those words.

Mr. RUSK. I am not sure whether that is the meaning.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In cases where a furlough is extended to an entire regiment or company, it was intended to include those cases.

Mr. RUSK. Yes; that is correct.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move to amend, on page 1212, by striking out section 4770. That section is a mere repetition, and is embraced in 4790, in the same words, under this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4771, on page 1212, I move to insert a hyphen between "fore" and "going" at the end of line 10.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4773, on page 1213, I move to insert a hyphen between "with" and "out" at the end of line 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4774, on page 1213, in line 6, I move to strike out the words "the widow" before the words "has abandoned," and to insert "she;" and in line 10 to strike out the word "then;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4774. If any person has died, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow entitled to a pension by reason of his death, and a child or children under sixteen years of age by such widow, and it shall be duly certified under seal by any court having probate jurisdiction, that satisfactory evidence has been produced before such court, upon due notice to the widow, that she has abandoned the care of such child or children, or that she is an unsuitable person, by reason of immoral conduct, to have the custody of the same, on presentation of satisfactory evidence thereof to the Commissioner of Pensions, no pension shall be allowed to such widow until such child or children shall have attained the age of sixteen years, any provisions of law to the contrary notwithstanding; and the said child or children shall be pensioned in the same manner, and from the same date, as if no widow had survived such person, and said pension shall be paid to the guardian of such child or children; but if in any case payment of pension shall have been made to the widow, the pension to the child or children shall commence from the date to which her pension has been paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4775, on page 1214, in line 9, I move to insert after the word "support" the words "in whole or in part;" also, in line 20, to strike out the word "are" and insert the word "were;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4775. If any person embraced within the provisions of sections 4759 and 4760 has died since the 4th day of March, 1861, or shall hereafter die, by reason of any wound, injury, casualty, or disease, which, under the conditions and limitations of such sections, would have entitled him to an invalid pension, and has not left or shall not leave a widow or legitimate child, but has left or shall leave other relative or relatives who were dependent upon him for support in whole or in part at the date of his death, such relative or relatives shall be entitled, in the following order of precedence, to receive the same pension as such person would have been entitled to had he been totally disabled, to commence from the death of such person, namely: first, the mother; secondly, the father; thirdly, orphan brothers and sisters under sixteen years of age, who shall be pensioned jointly: Provided, That where orphan children of the same parent have different guardians, or a portion of them only are under guardianship, the share of the joint pension to which each ward shall be entitled shall be paid to the guardian of such ward: Provided, That if in any case said person shall have left father and mother who were dependent upon him, then, on the death of the mother, the father shall become entitled to the pension, &c.

It should be in the past tense, the man being dead.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4779, on page 1216, in line 4, I move to strike out the word "of" after the word "seventy-seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. In section 4780, on page 1216, in line 2, I move to insert after the words "of pension" the words "to persons whose right accrued after the 4th day of March, 1861;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4780. The provisions of this title in respect to the rates of pension to persons whose right accrued after the 4th day of March, 1861, are extended to pensioners whose right to pension accrued under general acts passed since the war of the Revolution and prior to the 4th day of March, 1861, to take effect from and after the 25th day of July, 1866; and the widows of revolutionary soldiers and sailors receiving a less sum shall be paid at the rate of eight dollars per month from and after the 27th day of July, 1868.

The reason for that amendment is this: This section 4780 is one of the sections taken from the act to codify the pension statutes of March 3, 1873, and that was a codification of acts passed only since the 4th of March, 1861. This will be evident from the connection that it has in the original law, and it is important that it should be directly expressed here. Gentlemen of the Committee on Pensions will remember that by the third section of the act of 1866 it was attempted to equalize bounties. That third section was regarded as somewhat obscure, and in 1868 an act was passed explanatory of the third section of the act of 1866. This is the substance of that act. There will be frequent reference, in subsequent portions of this title, to this section, because from this date began the equalization of pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment is to section 4785.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4785. No claim for pension not prosecuted to successful issue within five years from the date of filing the same shall be admitted without record evidence from the War or Navy Department of the injury or the disease which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made: Provided, That in any case in which the limitation prescribed by this section bars the further prosecution of the claim, the claimant may present, through the Pension Office, to the Adjutant-General of the Army, or the Surgeon-General, or the Secretary of the Navy, evidence that the disease or injury which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made, originated in the service and in the line of duty; and if such evidence is deemed satisfactory by the officer to whom it may be submitted, he shall cause a record of the fact so proved to be made, and a copy of the same to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Pensions, and the bar to the prosecution of the claim shall thereby be removed.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The amendment is, after the words "or the Surgeon-General" strike out the comma, and the words "or the Secretary;" so that it will read "Adjutant-General of the Army, or Surgeon-General of the Navy." Those are the exact words of the act of March 4, 1873, and I find no reason for inserting the words "or the Secretary." On the contrary, the Adjutant-General of the Army and the Surgeon-General of the Navy are the only two officers recognized as having control of this matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment is to section 4786.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4786. If any pensioner, or any person entitled to a pension, who, during the pendency of his application therefor, has died since March 4, 1861, or shall hereafter die, his widow, or if no widow, his child or children under sixteen years of age at the time of his death, shall be entitled to receive the accrued pension to the date of death. Such accrued pension shall not be considered as a part of the assets of the estate of deceased, nor liable to be applied to the payment of the debts of said estate in any case whatever, but shall inure to the sole and exclusive benefit of the widow or children; and if no widow or child survive, no payment whatsoever of the accrued pension shall be made or allowed, except so much as may be necessary to reimburse the person who bore the expenses of the last sickness and burial of the decedent, in cases where he did not leave sufficient assets to meet such expenses.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The amendment is to strike out the first sentence, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

If any pensioner has died, or shall hereafter die, or if any person entitled to a pension, having an application therefor pending, has died, or shall hereafter die, his widow, or if there is no widow, the child or children of such person under the age of sixteen years, shall be entitled to receive the accrued pension to the date of the death of such person.

There is no difference in the meaning; this is a mere change of phraseology. But the sentence as it now stands is not grammatical, and is very awkward.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment is in section 4789.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4789. The term of limitation prescribed by sections 4777 and 4785 shall, in pending claims of Indians, be extended to two years from and after the 3d day of March, 1873; that all proof which has heretofore been taken before an Indian agent, or before an officer of any tribe, competent according to the rules of said tribe to administer oaths, shall be held and regarded by the Pension Office, in the examining and determining of claims of Indians now on file, as of the same validity as if taken before an officer recognized by the law at the time as competent to administer oaths; all proof wanting in said claims hereafter, as well as in those filed after the 3d day of March, 1873, shall be taken before the agent of the tribe to which the claimants respectively belong; in regard to dates, all applications of Indians now on file to be treated as though they were made before a competent officer at their respective dates, and if found to be in all other respects conclusive, they shall be allowed; and Indians shall be exempted from the obligation to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States required by section 4801, providing for pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and to widows of deceased soldiers.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The amendment is to insert the word "shall" after the words "applications of Indians now on file;" and at the end of the section strike out the words "required by section 4801, providing for pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and to widows of deceased soldiers." I will explain that amendment.

Of course the first is merely verbal, changing the form of expression from indirect to direct, which is the form adopted throughout the entire title.

The amendment striking out the latter part of the section is made for the reason that section 4801 there referred to contains no reference whatever to an oath; it is substantially taken from the first section of the code, found in volume 16, Statutes at Large, page 411, which refers to an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. No reference whatever is found in section 4801 of this title to any such oath. The only purpose of such reference was to say that Indians should not be required to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and that is fully expressed in the section by simply cutting off the lines, which only refer to a section which has no allusion whatever in it to any oath.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment is to section 4792.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 4792. No person in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps shall draw both a pension as an invalid and the pay of his rank or station in the service, unless the disability be such as to occasion his employment in a lower grade or in the civil branch of the service.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The amendment is to insert, after the words "unless the disability," the words "for which the pension was granted." Those words are found in the original act, on page 657, volume 5, and I know no good reason for leaving them out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment is to section 4795.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 4795. The half-pay of such widows and children shall be half the monthly pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the infantry of the regular Army, and no more, and no greater sum shall be allowed to any such widow or minor children than the half-pay of a lieutenant-colonel. But the two preceding sections shall not be construed to apply to or embrace the case of any person receiving a pension for life on the 3d day of June, 1858; and, wherever half-pay has been granted by any special act of Congress, and renewed or continued under the provisions of those sections, the same shall continue from the date above named.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The amendment is to add to the section the following:

Provided, That pensions under this and the two preceding sections shall be varied in accordance with the provisions of section 4780 of this title.

The reason for that amendment is found in what I remarked a while ago in reference to the act of 1866, equalizing pensions from that date, and the act of 1868, explanatory thereof. The class of pensions referred to in this section are to be varied precisely in accordance with the terms of those two acts, just as all pensions that were granted since the 4th day of March, 1861, are to be varied. All pensions, no matter what they were, were equalized by the acts of 1866 and 1868; and it will be seen by reference to sections 4793, 4794, and 4795, that they relate to pensions prior to the 4th of March, 1861.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment is to strike out sections 4796, 4797, and 4798.

The sections referred to were as follows:

SEC. 4796. The volunteers who were received into the service of the United States by virtue of the provisions of an act approved 13th of May, 1846, and who were wounded or otherwise disabled in the war with Mexico, shall be entitled to all the benefits which are conferred on persons wounded in the service of the United States.

SEC. 4797. Engineers, firemen, and coal-heavers in the Navy shall be entitled to pensions in the same manner as officers, seamen, and marines; and the widows of engineers, coal-heavers, and firemen in the same manner as the widows of officers, seamen, and marines, at the following rates: The pension of a chief engineer shall be the same as that of a lieutenant in the Navy; and the pension of the widow of a chief engineer the same as that of the widow of a lieutenant in the Navy; the pension of a first assistant engineer the same as that of a lieutenant of marines; and the pension of the widow of a first assistant engineer the same as that of the widow of a lieutenant of marines; the pension of a second or third assistant engineer the same as that of a forward officer; the pension of a fireman or coal-heaver the same as that of a seaman; the pension of the widow of a fireman or coal-heaver the same as that of the widow of a seaman. But an engineer, fireman, or coal-heaver shall not be entitled to any pension by reason of a disability incurred prior to the 31st day of August, 1842, nor shall the widow of an engineer, fireman, or coal-heaver be entitled to any pension by reason of the death of her husband, if his death was prior to that date.

SEC. 4798. The amount of pension in every case arising under the preceding section shall not exceed the half-pay of the deceased officer, seaman, or marine, as it existed in January, 1835, or such rate of pension as is allowed by the preceding section.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move now to insert in place of the sections just stricken out that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. If any officer, warrant or petty officer, seaman, engineer, first, second, or third assistant engineer, fireman, or coal-heaver of the Navy, or any marine, has been disabled prior to the 4th day of March, 1861, by reason of any injury received or disease contracted in the service and line of duty, he shall be entitled to receive, during the continuance of his disability, a pension proportionate to the degree of his disability not exceeding half the monthly pay of his rank as it existed in January, 1835. But the pension of a chief engineer shall be the same as that of a lieutenant of the Navy; the pension of a first assistant engineer the same as that of a lieutenant of marines; the pension of a second or third assistant engineer the same as that of a forward officer; the pension of a fireman or coal-heaver the same as that of a seaman; but an engineer, fireman, or coal-heaver shall not be entitled to any pension by reason of a disability incurred prior to the 31st day of August, 1842.

SEC. —. If any person referred to in the preceding section has died of injury received or disease contracted under the conditions therein stated, his widow shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay to which deceased was entitled at the date of his death; and in case of her death or marriage, the child or children under sixteen years of age shall be entitled to the pension. But the rate of pension herein allowed shall be governed by the pay of the Navy as it existed in January, 1835; and the pension of the widow of a chief engineer shall be the same as that of a widow of a lieutenant in the Navy; the widow of a first assistant engineer shall be the same as that of the widow of a lieutenant of marines; the pension of the widow of a second or third assistant engineer the same as that of the widow of a forward officer; the pension of the widow of a fireman or coal-heaver shall be the same as that of the widow of a seaman. But the rate of pension prescribed by this and the preceding section shall be varied from and after the 25th day of July, 1866, in accordance with the provisions of section 4780 of this title; and the widow of an engineer, fireman, or coal-heaver shall not be entitled to any pension by reason of the death of her husband, if his death was prior to the 31st day of August, 1842.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this amendment embodies substantially what is found in sections 7497 and 4798 of the revision; but in addition to prescribing pensions to engineers, firemen, and coal-heavers it embodies all the law pertaining to naval pensions prior to 1861. It is the embodiment of the acts of August 11, 1848, June 30, 1834, and January 28, 1813. It is merely an expression of the law of naval pensions. I propose that it shall follow immediately after section 475.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I propose to offer a substitute for section 4796.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4796. The volunteers who were received into the service of the United States by virtue of the provisions of an act approved 13th May, 1846, and who were wounded or otherwise disabled in the war with Mexico, shall be entitled to all the benefits which are conferred on persons wounded in the service of the United States.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I propose the following sections as a substitute for section 4796, to come in immediately after the sections just sent to the Clerk's desk:

SEC. —. Any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, whether of the regular Army or volunteers, disabled by reason of injury received or disease contracted while in the line of duty in actual service in the war with Mexico, or in going to or returning from the same, who received an honorable discharge, shall be entitled to a pension proportionate to his disability, not exceeding for total disability half the pay of his rank at the date at which he received the wound or contracted the disease which resulted in such disability. But no pension shall exceed half the pay of a lieutenant-colonel.

SEC. —. If any officer or other person referred to in the preceding section has died, or shall hereafter die, by reason of any injury received or disease contracted under the circumstances therein set forth, his widow shall be entitled to receive the same pension as the husband would have been entitled to, had he been totally disabled; and in case of her death or remarriage the child or children of such officer or other person referred to in the preceding section, while under the age of sixteen years, shall be entitled to receive the pension. But the rate of pension prescribed by this and the preceding section shall be varied after the 25th day of July, 1866, in accordance with the provisions of section 4780 of this title.

The sections proposed as substitutes for sections 4797 and 4798 pertain to old naval pensions, while the sections substituted for section 4796 pertain to pensions growing out of the Mexican war.

Section 4796 is the seventh section of the act found on page 10 of volume 9 of the Statutes at Large, and seems to be the only reference in this entire title to the pensions connected with the Mexican war. The two sections which are suggested as a substitute for this section embody the acts of September 28, 1850, February 22, 1849, and July 21, 1848, as well as the act of May 13, 1846, which is the section contained in this revision. The entire subject of pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war seems in some way or other to have been omitted from the revision, which omission is supplied by these two sections.

I desire to state in this connection that in regard to these two sections as well as the former sections in regard to naval pensions, I have had very valuable assistance from the Department and especially from Dr. Ewing of that Department. I think the sections as proposed will cover the entire subject.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. There is another omission in the revision—the omission of definite and exact reference to the pensioners of the war of 1812, and of the Indian wars since 1790. I propose the following as an additional section to be inserted immediately after the amendment just read:

SEC.—. The widows and children under sixteen years of age of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the regulars, militia, and volunteers of the war of 1812, and the various Indian wars since 1790, who remained at the date of their death in the military service of the United States, or who received an honorable discharge and have died or shall hereafter die of injury received or disease contracted in the service and in the line of duty, shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time he received the injury or contracted the disease which resulted in his death. But no half-pay pension shall exceed the half-pay of a lieutenant-colonel; and such half-pay pension shall be varied after the 25th day of July, 1866, in accordance with the provisions of section 4780 of this title,

This section embodies the law, so far as it is necessary to preserve it, with reference to the pensioners of the war of 1812 and of the Indian wars since 1790, and is the substance of the acts of July 4, 1836, February 22, 1849, and February 3, 1853.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I offer the following additional section, which is intended to cover any possible case of revolutionary pensions:

SEC. —. All pensioners whose names are now on the pension-roll, or who are entitled to restoration to the roll under any act of Congress, shall be entitled to the continuance of such pensions under the provisions and limitations of this title, and to such further increase of pension as is herein provided.

Mr. Speaker, it appears that there are still on the pension-rolls about five hundred widows of revolutionary pensioners. These, I suppose, are instances of young women who married old soldiers; at least their names are there; and while it is not necessary to preserve all the old laws with reference to revolutionary pensions, this section is proposed as a safeguard against any possible injury being done to the rights of any of these parties.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move to amend by striking out sections 4808 and 4809.

The sections were as follows:

SEC. 4808. No widow entitled to a pension, and claiming a pension, whose husband was drawing one at the time of his decease, shall be required, in any such case, to furnish any further evidence that her husband was entitled to a pension; nor shall any evidence, in any case, be required to entitle the widow to a pension, when the evidence is in the archives of the Government, other than such proof as would be sufficient to establish the marriage between the applicant and the deceased pensioner in civil personal actions in a court of justice.

SEC. 4809. In all applications for pensions by the widows of deceased soldiers, under the act of July 21, 1848, the returns on the rolls of the disease of which the soldier died, and the official opinion of the Surgeon-General founded thereon, that from the nature of the disease it was contracted while the soldier was in the line of duty, shall be considered satisfactory evidence thereof, and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions, in all cases of application for pensions under that act, to apply to the proper officers for such evidence, without requiring the applicant to furnish the same.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Section 4808 is taken from the act of May 7, 1846, Statutes at Large, volume 9, page 6; and section 4809 is taken from the act of March 3, 1849, Statutes at Large, volume 9, page 418. Both of these sections have reference solely to cases arising out of the Mexican war. They have ceased to be of any value whatever in that respect, and should not be made applicable in this general title to other cases. I therefore move that they be struck out. They pertain solely to evidence in Mexican-war cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move in section 4810, page 1322, line 7, to strike out "prior to January 1, 1800;" so it will read:

SEC. 4810. In all cases where a pension has been granted to any officer or soldier of the Revolution in his life-time, the evidence upon which such pension was granted shall be conclusive of the service of such officer or soldier in the application of any widow or woman who may have been the widow of such officer or soldier, for a pension; and upon proof by her that she was married to any such officer or soldier, and that she is a widow, she shall thereupon be placed upon the pension-rolls at the same rate that such officer or soldier received during his life-time.

This refers to the pensions of the widows of revolutionary officers and soldiers. It requires proof that the applicant is a widow, and was married to such officer or soldier. The act of July 1, 1848, required proof of marriage to such officer or soldier prior to January 1, 1794. The act of July 29 of the same year contains the words found in this revision, but in making the revision the gentlemen who did it seem in some way or other to omit the act of July 3, 1872, which extends the pension to those subsequent as well as to those married prior to 1800, so there is no restriction whatever, and the words should be stricken from this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move in section 4815, page 1223, in line 5, to strike out the words "to him or her;" so it will read:

SEC. 4815. That the Commissioner of Pensions, on application being made to him in person, or by letter, by any claimant or applicant for pension, bounty-land, or other allowance required by law to be adjusted or paid by the Pension Office, shall furnish such person, free of all expense, all such printed instructions and forms as may be necessary in establishing and obtaining said claim; and on the issuing of a certificate of pension or of a bounty-land warrant, he shall forthwith notify the claimant or applicant, and also the agent or attorney in the case, if there be one, that such certificate has been issued, or allowance made, and the date and amount thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move in section 4828, page 1226, line 1, to strike out the word "Navy" and insert the word "Interior."

This was taken from the act of February, 1813, but that act was changed by the act of March 3, 1849, and the duties were transferred from the Secretary of the Navy to the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move, in the same section, in lines 16, 17, and 18, to strike out the word "paid," and insert the words "from moneys appropriated for the payment of pensions;" so it will read:

SEC. 4828. The Secretary of the Interior is required to place on the pension-list, under the like regulations and restrictions as are used in relation to the Navy of the United States, any officer, seaman, or marine, who, on board of any private armed vessel bearing a commission of letter of marque, shall have been wounded or otherwise disabled in any engagement with the enemy, or in the line of their duty as officers, seamen, or marines of such private armed vessel; allowing to the captain a sum not exceeding twenty dollars per month; to lieutenants and sailing-master a sum not exceeding twelve dollars each per month; to marine officer, boatswain, gunner, carpenter, master's mate, and prize-masters, a sum not exceeding ten dollars each per month; to all other officers a sum not exceeding eight dollars each per month, for the highest rate of disability, and so in proportion; and to a seaman, or acting as a marine, the sum of six dollars per month, for the highest rate of disability, and so in proportion; which several pensions shall be from moneys appropriated for the payment of pensions by direction of the Secretary of the Navy, out of the privateer-pension fund, and from no other.

The closing portion of the paragraph in that section reads as follows: "which several pensions shall be paid by direction of the Secretary of the Navy, out of the privateer-pension fund, and from no other." That is the act found in volume 2, page 799, volume 3, page 86; but the manner of this payment was changed by the act of April 5, 1856, found in volume 11, section 3, page 4, which provides this particular class of pensions shall be paid from moneys appropriated for the payment of pensions; that is, from the general pension fund. The change made by the act of 1856 seems to have escaped the attention of the gentlemen who revised the laws.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move in section 4838, page 1228, line 13, to strike out the word "total;" in line 14, after the word "limb," to insert the words "or other essential portion of the body;" and after the word "or," in the same line, to insert the word "for;" so as to read:

SEC. 4838. In all cases of application for the payment of pensions to invalid pensioners to the 4th day of September of an odd year, the certificate of an examining surgeon duly appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, or of a surgeon of the Army or Navy, stating the continuance of the disability for which the pension was originally granted, describing it, and the degree of such disability at the time of making the certificate, shall be required to accompany the vouchers, and a duplicate thereof shall be filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions; and if in a case of continued disability it shall be stated at a degree below that for which the pension was originally granted, or was last paid, the pensioner shall only be paid for the quarter then due at the rate stated in the certificate. But where the pension was originally granted for a disability in consequence of the loss of a limb or other essential portion of the body, or for other cause which cannot, either in whole or in part, be removed, or when a disability is certified, by competent examining surgeons, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions, to have become permanent in a degree equal to the whole rate of pension, the above certificate shall not be necessary to entitle the pensioner to payment.

Mr. Speaker, the word "total" is not in the act of March 3, 1873; and I know of no good reason why we should insert it here. After the word "limb," in line 14, in this same section, are also found the words which I have suggested, "or other essential portion of the body." The word "for" is not in the original act, but needs to be inserted to preserve the construction of the sentence.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move in section 4849, page 1230, to prefix these words: "in addition to the compensation allowed in this title;" and change the capital "E" in the word "Each," at the beginning of line 1, to a small "e;" so it will read:

SEC. 4849. In addition to the compensation allowed in this title, each pension agent shall be allowed, as full compensation for all service, including postage required by the provisions of sections 4831 and 4832, the sum of thirty cents, and no more, for each voucher prepared and paid by him, which amount shall be paid by the United States.

Section 4848 of this title prescribes the pay that shall be given to agents for disbursements made above. Section 4849 prescribes the pay that agents shall receive for execution of certain papers. The words "in addition to the compensation allowed in this title" are found in the original act. It seems to me they would be better placed here, or it would seem to imply the compensation for papers is the only compensation agents would receive. At any rate, it is the law as it stands, and it is better to insert than to omit it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move to strike out section 4850 and section 4854; which are as follows:

SEC. 4850. Every guardian having the charge and custody of the pension of his ward who embezzles the same in violation of his trust, or fraudulently converts the same to his own use, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $2,000 or imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding five years, or both.

SEC. 4854. Every agent or attorney, or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension or bounty-land, who wrongfully withholds from a pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of the pension or claim allowed and due such pensioner or claimant, or the land-warrant issued to any such claimant, shall be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both.

I desire to state my reason for that. Sections 4850, 4852, 4854, and 5553 of the crimes act were all taken from section 31 of the act of March 3, 1873.

Section 4850 prescribes the punishment that shall be visited upon a guardian who embezzles or fraudulently converts to his own use any pension belonging to his ward.

Section 4854 prescribes the punishment for an agent or attorney who wrongfully withholds from a pensioner or claimant any portion of the pension he has collected for him.

Section 5553 of the crimes act is taken from this act, and prescribes the punishment that shall be inflicted on an attorney who charges more than is provided in section 4852. It is also a portion of the same section, 31, of the act of March 3, 1873.

Now, in discussing this in the committee, we have decided that it is better to transfer all these penalties and offenses to the crimes act. Hence, we propose to strike out section 4850, which prescribes the punishment that shall be inflicted on a guardian who embezzles or fraudulently converts the pension of his ward, and section 4854, which prescribes the punishment which shall be inflicted on an agent or attorney who withholds from a pensioner or claimant any part of his pension or claim allowed. And at the proper time when that is reached the committee will propose to strike out also section 5553 in the crimes act, and introduce a substitute, including the whole of that class of offenses, so that they will all be embodied together in the crimes act. I only ask the House now to assent to my proposition to strike out these sections from this title, with the understanding that they will be reinstated in the crimes act. There are some amendments to be made there also, and the whole will be made correct when we reach that portion of the revision.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I understand the gentleman to say that the crimes act embodies all the penalties for violation of any of the laws of the United States.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I did not say that; because there are instances through the revision where penalties for offenses are permitted to stand in connection with the titles where those offenses are specified. But inasmuch as part of section 31 of the act of March 3, 1873, has already been embodied in the crimes act, it has been thought better by the committee that all the offenses that it provides for shall be placed together in the crimes act.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio whether it would not be better, and have a more salutary effect to keep here these penalties which are made a part of this law? I merely put this in the shape of an inquiry, in order to elicit a little more information in regard to this point.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I can only say to the gentleman that the committee has discussed that point to some extent, and we have come unanimously to this conclusion, that these penalties should be in one place or the other; that there is no propriety in separating them as they are separated in the revision. And upon a full discussion of it we have concluded it was better, inasmuch as these are made severe offenses, punishable not only with fine but with imprisonment for from two to five years, that they should be embodied in the crimes act and put there in one place, so that there should be no difficulty in finding them.

Mr. POLAND. I may be allowed to state further, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri, that there are various places in the revenue laws, the internal-revenue law, and the customs-revenue law, where penalties for the violation of the laws are incorporated in the laws themselves. And where we have found the whole provisions upon that subject placed in the revision of the revenue laws, the internal-revenue law, or the customs-revenue law, we have left them there. We should probably have done the same in reference to these penalties for the violations of the pension law, except that the revisers had transferred the penal sections to the crimes act; and the committee determined that they should be all together in some place. If a portion of them were to be in the crimes act, we thought it better to transfer them all there.

Indeed, I think it would have been better if the revisers had started on the plan of putting all offenses under any law in the crimes act. But they have not done that. The committee, however, decided that all the penal sections relating to the same subject ought to be together, and, therefore, they propose to transfer these to where a portion of the penalties are already found; that is, in the crimes act.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I think the committee would be in the right if all the penalties were found in the crimes act. But since a part are in the crimes act, while a part are in a different place, I am rather of the opinion that it would have a better effect to permit these penalties in the pension law to remain where they are, unless we undertake to codify all of those penalties in the crimes act. I agree with the committee that it would be better to put them all in the crimes act, but as they have not been put there, my impression is that it might be as well to let these sections remain as they are.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. We cannot do that. In this instance there would be no propriety in doing as the gentleman suggests, unless we brought section 5553 from the crimes act over to the pension act.

Mr. POLAND. The class of persons aimed at by these penalties is not a class of persons likely to sin in ignorance of the laws. Pension agents and attorneys are usually sharp enough; I do not think we need take any pains in regard to them. I have not any doubt in relation to the wisdom of what my colleague from Ohio proposes here in behalf of the committee. My great doubt is whether we ought not to have done the same thing in all cases. But in most of the penal sections of the revenue laws the offenses are of a much lighter grade than this, and might more appropriately be left to stand as part of those laws than higher crimes, with the severe penalties that these sections are intended to meet. This seems to me the only appropriate place for these sections.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move on page 1231, section 4852, in line 1, to insert after the word "attorney" the words "or other persons;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4852. No agent or attorney or other persons shall demand or receive any other compensation for his services in prosecuting a claim for pension or bounty land than such as the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct to be paid to him, not exceeding twenty-five dollars.

It is so in the act from which this section was taken; and it is important, I think, that is should be inserted here; otherwise it might leave open the plea that the party was not an agent or attorney, although it would scarcely be a legal plea.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. On the same page, in section 4855, in line 7, after the word "resection" I move to insert the words "or who was entitled to receive such limb or apparatus since said date."

I will state the reason for that amendment, and I can do it best by reading the section as it will be if amended. It is as follows:

SEC. 4855. Every officer, soldier, seaman, and marine, who was disabled during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, in the military or naval service, and in the line of duty, or in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted therein, and who was furnished by the War Department, since the 17th day of June, 1870, with an artificial limb or apparatus for resection, or who was entitled to receive such limb or apparatus since said date, shall be entitled to receive a new limb or apparatus at the expiration of every five years thereafter, under such regulations as have been or may be prescribed by the Surgeon-General of the Army.

The act having been passed in 1870, there may be persons who did not receive the apparatus for resection or artificial limbs to which they were entitled under the law, and hence it is necessary to put in this amendment to meet any case of that kind.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment is on page 1231. In section 4858, line 1, I move to strike out the word "person," and insert the word "soldier;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4858. Every soldier who lost a limb during the war of the rebellion, but from the nature of his injury is not able to use an artificial limb, shall be entitled to the benefit of section 4856, and shall receive money commutation as therein provided.

I do not know why this change should have been made in the revision of the laws. The law did not intend to imply that everybody who lost a limb during the war of the rebellion should receive an artificial limb.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would inquire if the act in regard to artificial limbs included sailors.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The language is, "every officer, soldier, seaman, and marine."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then, in section 4858, would the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio include all that he desires to accomplish?

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Well, probably it would be better, Mr. Speaker, to enlarge the language. I took the word "soldier" from the act of June 17, 1870. As the section stands here, "every person who lost a limb during the rebellion" is rather too broad an expression. A man might have lost his leg up North in an entirely different kind of business. I will withdraw my amendment and offer the following, at the suggestion of my colleague on the committee, from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.] After the words "every person," insert the words "in the military or naval service."

Mr. BROMBERG. What does the law say?

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The law says "every soldier;" at least that is the act of June 17, 1870.

Mr. BROMBERG. Why change it, then?

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I will state why. This title was made up from a great many different laws, and it is necessary to make the words conform to the text as they are found here in this title. There are other acts which apply just as well to seamen and marines as to soldiers in the land service, and the laws included in this section in being placed here should not be limited in conferring the benefits upon all these parties. I suppose that is the reason why the word "persons" was employed by the revisers. I will state that this is the last amendment I have to propose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to page 1211, section 4765, line 32, the last provision of that section. I was not here at the time the gentleman offered his amendment; I have only just come into the House; and I would like to know what the amendment was which was offered by the gentleman. I will state this, that the Committee on Invalid Pensions had an amendment to this section under discussion a few days since, and we agreed upon an amendment to this section.

The Clerk read the amendments proposed and adopted to section 4765, as follows:

In line 32 strike out the words "provided further that;" begin "except" with a capital "E;" make the proviso a separate section; and in line 34, after the words "surgeon's certificate," insert the words "establishing the same made under the pending claim for increase."

The Clerk then read the section as amended, as follows:

SEC. 4765. From and after June 4, 1872, all persons entitled by law to a less pension than hereinafter specified, who, while in the military or naval service of the United States, and in line of duty, shall have lost the sight of both eyes, or shall have lost the sight of one eye, the sight of the other having been previously lost, or shall have lost both hands, or shall have lost both feet, or been permanently and totally disabled in the same, or otherwise so permanently and totally disabled as to render them utterly helpless, or so nearly so as to require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person, shall be entitled to a pension of $31.25 per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally and permanently disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to be incapacitated for performing any manual labor, but not so much as to require regular personal aid and attendance, shall be entitled to a pension of twenty-four dollars per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand, or one foot, or been totally and permanently disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to render their incapacity to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or foot, shall be entitled to a pension of eighteen dollars per month: Provided, That all persons who, under like circumstances, have lost a leg above the knee, and in consequence thereof are so disabled that they cannot use artificial limbs, shall be rated in the second class and receive twenty-four dollars per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost the hearing of both ears, shall be entitled to a pension of thirteen dollars per month: Provided, That the pension for a disability not permanent, equivalent in degree to any provided for in this section, shall, during the continuance of the disability in such degree, be at the same rate as that herein provided for a permanent disability of like degree. Except in cases of permanent specific disabilities, no increase of pension shall be allowed to commence prior to the date of the examining surgeon's certificate, establishing the same, made under the pending claim for increase; and that in this, as well as all other cases, the certificate of an examining surgeon, or of a board of examining surgeons, shall be subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Now, if I have the permission of the House, I would like to have read the amendment which was proposed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. My impression is that it is somewhat better than the amendment agreed upon by the committee.

Mr. POLAND. Is the amendment an alteration of the law?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No; I think not. I think it is a little more expressive of the words of the law than as the section now stands.

The Clerk read Mr. CRITTENDEN'S amendment, as follows:

That the third and last proviso of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873, be so amended that it shall read:

Provided further, That except in cases of permanent, specific disability, the increase of pension shall commence from the date of the examining surgeon's certificate that first shows the increased disability.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Probably I can make that a little plainer by illustrating it. A is wounded during the war; a surgeon examines his case and pronounces him entitled to a pension, we will say at four dollars a month. At the expiration of a year he is re-examined, and upon the second examination the first is confirmed. At the expiration of the second year he is re-examined again, or he is re-examined every six months, if you please; and the third surgeon says he is entitled to an increased amount of pension. At the end of the third year he is re-examined. The fourth surgeon says he is in better condition than he was when first examined. Now the question is, is he not, by the provision here, referred back to his first pension, of four dollars per month, instead of being allowed to continue to receive his pension of eight dollars per month upon the third surgeon's certificate that his disability has increased? The intention of the Committee on Pensions is that he shall continue to receive the pension given him upon his re-examination, that is, eight dollars a month.

Mr. BARBER. He cannot get this increase without making application for an increase.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Application has to be made, of course.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I think the gentleman will agree with me at any rate that the proviso should be made a separate section; that is a merely formal matter.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I agree with the gentleman fully there.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I believe I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] He proposes that the section shall read, "That except in case of permanent specific disability the increase of pension shall commence from the date of the examining surgeon's certificate showing increase of disability." I do not see that there is any great difference between that amendment and the one we propose, except that we state negatively what that amendment states positively. The amendment proposed by us is, "That except in case of permanent increased disability, no increase of pension shall be allowed to commence prior to the date of the examining surgeon's certificate establishing the same made under the pending claim for increase." In other words, the amount of pension is determined under a particular surgeon's examination at the time the claim is made for an increase. As I understand, that has always been the practice of the Department. It is in accordance with that practice that we have framed this section.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Just here a moment, if the gentleman will permit me. I will state why it is that we desire to have this language in the most positive form that we can put it in. My observation of the Pension Office is, and I speak of it with great respect, and with no desire to cast any reflection upon the office, that unless the language is pointed, and unless the office is directed by positive language to give these pensions, I do not care how negatively you may express it, they will every time take advantage of the law. They do it, I think, with the very best of motives, to preserve the public funds. But with my short experience in connection with the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I think they are a little too careful of the public funds, and very frequently keep soldiers out of pensions when they really should have them. Therefore we have agreed upon this language of the most affirmative character that could be used.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I do not know that I would disagree with the gentleman as to the propriety of the amendment in the form he suggests; but my impression is that we have gone as far as we ought to go in arranging this section. We have conformed it to the law as it is, and to the usage of the office as it is. And, as I understand our duties, that is as far as we are entitled to go. It may be possible that it would be better if the section went a little further than it does. The gentleman admits that his positive amendment will carry it a little further and effect a change in the operations of the Pension Bureau. The Committee on Revision do not feel at liberty to attempt anything of the kind. If the gentleman desires such an amendment I think he had better not urge it in so small a House as this, but present it as an amendment to the pension law.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. POLAND. I have an amendment to propose to the chapter on crimes. I move to strike out section 5553.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 5553. Every agent or attorney for the preparation and prosecution of a claim for pension or bounty land, who directly or indirectly contracts for, demands, receives, or retains any greater compensation for his services as such agent or attorney than is prescribed by law, shall be fined not more than $500, or imprisoned at hard labor not more than five years, or both.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to insert in place of the section just struck out, and to supply the place of the two sections struck out of the chapter on pensions, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The sections proposed to be inserted were as follows:

SEC. —. Any agent or attorney, or any other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension or bounty land, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive or retain any greater compensation for his services or instrumentality in prosecuting a claim for pension or bounty land than is provided in the title pertaining to pensions, or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of the pension or claim allowed and due such pensioner or claimant, or the land-warrant issued to any such claimant, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. —. If any guardian, having the charge or custody of the pension of his ward, shall embezzle the same in violation of his trust, or fraudulently convert the same to his own use, he shall be punished by fine not exceeding $2,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The additional sections were agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend, so as to make the word "spirits," in sections 3311 and 3312, read "spirit."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3313, by striking out the final "s" in the word "spirits," and by inserting at the end the words, "set forth and declared for the inspection and gauging of spirits throughout the United States;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3313. In all sales of spirit a gallon shall be held to be a gallon of proof spirits, according to the standard prescribed in the preceding section, set forth and declared for the inspection and gauging of spirits throughout the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3318 by transposing the words "except as to the tax thereon;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3318. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, or grapes, from any provision of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend, by striking out in section 3321 the words "hereafter set up," in line 11; so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3321. Every person having in his possession or custody, or under his control, any still or distilling apparatus set up, shall register the same with the collector of the district in which it is, by subscribing and filing with him duplicate statements, in writing, setting forth the particular place where such still or distilling apparatus is set up, the kind of still and its cubic contents, the owner thereof, his place of residence, and the purpose for which said still or distilling apparatus has been or is intended to be used; one of which statements shall be retained and preserved by the collector, and the other transmitted by him to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Stills and distilling apparatus shall be registered immediately upon their being set up. Every still or distilling apparatus not so registered, together with all personal property in the possession or custody, or under the control of such person, and found in the building, or in any yard or inclosure connected with the building in which the same may be set up, shall be forfeited. And every person having in his possession or custody, or under his control, any still or distilling apparatus set up which is not so registered, shall pay a penalty of $500, and shall be fined not less than $100, nor more than $1,000, and imprisoned for not less than one month, nor more than two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3322 by inserting after the word "collector," in line 36, the words "or proper deputy collector;" and by inserting after the word "change," in line 37, the words "and any deputy collector receiving such notice shall immediately transmit the same to the collector of the district;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3322. Every person engaged in, or intending to be engaged in, the business of a distiller or rectifier, shall give notice in writing, subscribed by him, to the collector of the district wherein such business is to be carried on, stating his name and residence, and if a company or firm, the name and residence of each member thereof, the name and residence of every person interested or to be interested in the business, the precise place where said business is to be carried on, and whether of distilling or rectifying; and if such business is carried on in a city, the residence and place of business shall be indicated by the name of the street and number of the building. In case of a distiller, the notice shall also state the kind of stills and the cubic contents thereof, the number and kind of boilers, the number of mash-tubs and fermenting-tubs, the cubic contents of each tub, the number of receiving cisterns, the cubic contents of each cistern, the number of hours in which the distillery will ferment each tub of mash or beer, the estimated quantity of distilled spirits which the apparatus is capable of distilling every twenty-four hours, a particular description of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, and of the buildings thereon, including their size, material, and construction; and that said distillery premises are not within six hundred feet, in a direct line, of any premises authorized to be used for rectifying or refining distilled spirits by any process. In case of a rectifier, the notice shall state the precise place where such business is to be carried on, the name and residence of every person interested or to be interested in the business, the process by which the applicant intends to rectify, purify, or refine distilled spirits, the kind and cubic contents of any still used or to be used for such purpose, the estimated quantity of spirits which can be rectified, purified, or refined every twenty-four hours in such establishment, and that said rectifying establishment is not within six hundred feet, in a direct line, of the premises of any distillery registered for the distillation of spirits. In case of any change in the location, form, capacity, ownership, agency, superintendency, or in the persons interested in the business of such distillery or rectifying establishment, or in the time of fermenting the mash or beer, notice thereof, in writing, shall be given to the said collector or proper deputy collector of the district within twenty-four hours after such change, and any deputy collector receiving such notice shall immediately transmit the same to the collector of the district. Every notice required by this section shall be in such form, and shall contain such additional particulars, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, from time to time, prescribe. Every person who fails or refuses to give such notice shall pay a penalty of $1,000, and shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $2,000; and every person who gives a false or fraudulent notice shall, in addition to such penalty or fine, be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3325, by striking out in line 6 the word "mortgage" and insert "mortgagee;" and by inserting after the word "or," in line 27, the words "in any case of such prior erection;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3325. No bond of a distiller shall be approved, unless he is the owner in fee, unincumbered by any mortgage, judgment, or other lien, of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, or unless he files with the collector, in connection with his notice, the written consent of the owner of the fee, and of any mortgagee, judgment creditor, or other person having a lien thereon, duly acknowledged, that the premises may be used for the purpose of distilling spirits, subject to the provisions of law, and expressly stipulating that the lien of the United States for taxes and penalties shall have priority of such mortgage, judgment, or other incumbrance, and that in case of the forfeiture of the distillery premises, or of any part thereof, the title of the same shall vest in the United States, discharged from such mortgage, judgment, or other incumbrance. In any case where the owner of a distillery, or distilling-apparatus, erected prior to the 20th day of July, 1868, has only an estate for a term of years, or other estate less than fee-simple, in the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, the evidence of title to which shall have been duly recorded prior to that date; or in like case, where the lease or other evidence of title is held, but was not required by the laws of the State to be recorded in order to be valid at the time of its execution; or in any case of such prior erection where the title was then, and has continued to be, in litigation; or in any case of such prior erection where such owner is possessed of the fee, but incumbered with a mortgage executed and duly recorded prior to said 20th of July, 1868, and not due, or in any case of such prior erection where the fee is held by a feme-covert, minor, person of unsound mind, or other person incapable of giving consent, as hereinbefore required, the value of such lot or tract of land, together with the building and distilling-apparatus, shall be appraised in the manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the collector may at the discretion of the Commissioner, be authorized to accept, in lieu of the said written consent of the owner of the fee, the bond of such distiller, in such form as the Commissioner may prescribe, with not less than two sureties, conditioned that in case the distillery, distilling-apparatus, or any part thereof, shall by final judgment be forfeited for the violation of any of the provisions of law, the obligors shall pay the amount stated in said bond. Said sureties shall be residents of the collection district or county, or of an adjoining county in the same State in which the distillery is situated, and owners of unincumbered real estate in said district or county, or adjoining county, equal to such appraised value, and the penal sum of said bond shall be equal to the appraised value of said lot or tract of land together with the buildings and distilling-apparatus: Provided, That in the case of any distillery sold at judicial or other sale in favor of the United States, a bond may be taken at the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in lieu of the written consent required by this section, and the person giving such bond may be allowed to operate such distillery during the existence of the right of redemption from such sale, on complying with all the other provisions of law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3330 by substituting for the word "spirit," in line 8, the word "spirits."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3342 by inserting after the words "rectifier of spirits," in line 7, the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3343 by an addition after the word "therewith," at the end of the section; so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 3343. It shall not be lawful for any distiller to commence or to continue the business of distilling, until he has given the bond required by law, and complied with the provisions of law relating to the registration and survey of distilleries, and the arrangement and construction of distilleries and the premises connected therewith. Nor shall it be lawful for a person to engage in the business of distilling on any premises distant less than six hundred feet in a direct line from any premises used for rectifying; nor shall the processes of distillation and rectification both be carried on within a distance of six hundred feet in a direct line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3344 by inserting after the word "distillation," in line 9, the words "or rectification;" and by inserting after the word "spirits," in the same line, the words "or for the compounding of liquors;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3344. Every person who carries on the business of a distiller without having given bond as required by law, or who engages in or carries on the business of a distiller with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or of any part thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years. And all distilled spirits or wines, and all stills or other apparatus fit or intended to be used for the distillation or rectification of spirits, or for the compounding of liquors, owned by such person, wherever found, and all distilled spirits or wines and personal property found in the distillery or in any building, room, yard, or inclosure connected therewith, and used with or constituting a part of the premises, and all the right, title, and interest of such person in the lot or tract of land on which such distillery is situated, and all the right, title, and interest therein of every person who knowingly has suffered or permitted the business of a distiller to be there carried on, or has connived at the same; and all personal property owned by or in possession of any person who has permitted or suffered any building, yard, or inclosure, or any part thereof, to be used for purposes of ingress or egress to or from such distillery, which shall be found in any such building, yard, or inclosure, and all the right, title, and interest of every person in any premises used for ingress or egress to or from such distillery, who has knowingly suffered or permitted such premises to be used for such ingress or egress, shall be forfeited to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I wish to move an amendment to section 3345.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3345. No mash, wort, or wash, fit for distillation, or for the production of spirits or alcohol, shall be made or fermented in any building, or on any premises other than a distillery duly authorized according to law; and no mash, wort, or wash so made and fermented shall be sold or removed from any distillery before being distilled; and no person, other than an authorized distiller shall, by distillation, or by any other process, separate the alcoholic spirits from any fermented mash, wort, or wash; and no person shall use spirits or alcohol, or any vapor of alcoholic spirits, in manufacturing vinegar or any other article, or in any process of manufacture whatever, unless the spirits or alcohol so used shall have been produced in an authorized distillery and the tax thereon paid. Every person who violates any provision of this section shall be fined for each offense not less than $500, nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months, nor more than two years: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to fermented liquors, or to fermented liquids used for the manufacture of vinegar exclusively.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend, by adding at the end of the section the following:

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the distillation of such fermented liquids, except in an authorized distillery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3349 by transposing the last sentence; so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3349. Whenever any officer requires the water contained in any worm-tub in a distillery, at any time when the still is not at work, to be drawn off and the tub and worm cleansed, the water shall forthwith be drawn off, and the tub and worm cleansed by the distiller, or his workmen, accordingly; and the water shall be kept and continued out of such worm-tub for a period of two hours, or until the officer has finished his examination thereof. For any refusal or neglect to comply with any provisions of this section the distiller shall forfeit the sum of $1,000. And it shall be lawful for the officer to draw off such water, or any portion of it, and to keep the same drawn off for so long a time as he shall think necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3357 by transposing the line embracing the words "tax paid;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3357. Any distilled spirits may, on payment of the tax thereon, be withdrawn from warehouse on application to the collector of the district in charge of such warehouse, on making a withdrawal entry in duplicate and in the following form:

ENTRY FOR WITHDRAWAL OF DISTILLED SPIRITS FROM WAREHOUSE.

Tax paid.

Entry of distilled spirits to be withdrawn, on payment of the tax, from ——— warehouse, by ———, deposited on the ——— day of ———, anno Domini ———, by ———, in said warehouse.

And the entry shall specify the whole number of casks, with the marks and the serial numbers thereon, the number of gauge or wine gallons, and of proof gallons, and the amount of the tax on the distilled spirits contained in them, all of which shall be verified by the oath of the person making such entry; and on payment of the tax the collector shall issue his order to the store-keeper in charge of the warehouse for the delivery. One of said entries shall be filed in the office of the collector, and the other transmitted by him to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3359 by inserting after the word "warehouse," in line 6, the words, "or other warehouse for distilled spirits authorized by law;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3359. Whenever any person removes, or aids or abets in the removal of any distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid, to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, or conceals or aids in the concealment of any spirits so removed, or removes, or aids or abets in the removal of any distilled spirits from any distillery warehouse or other warehouse for distilled spirits authorized by law, in any manner other than is provided by law, or conceals or aids in the concealment of any spirits so removed, he shall be liable to a penalty of double the tax imposed on such distilled spirits so removed or concealed, and shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than three years.

This amendment was given to us by the Department, the officers of which insisted that it ought to be put in, because it is found in the law. They claim there may be spirits in bonded warehouses.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3364 by inserting after the word "indicating," in line 4, the words "in each case;" and by striking out in line 5 the word "each;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3364. Every store-keeper shall keep a warehouse book, which shall at all times be open to the examination of any revenue officer, and shall enter therein an account of all articles deposited in the warehouse to which he is assigned, indicating in each case the date of deposit, by whom manufactured or produced, the number and description of the packages and contents, the quantities therein, the marks and serial numbers thereon, and by whom gauged, inspected, or weighed, and if distilled spirits, the number of gauge or wine gallons and of proof gallons; and before delivering any article from the warehouse he shall enter in said book the date of the permit or order of the collector for the delivery of such articles, the number and description of the packages, the marks and serial numbers thereon, the date of delivery, to whom delivered, and for what purpose, which purpose shall be specified in the permit or order for delivery; and in case of delivery of any distilled spirits the number of gauge or wine gallons, and of proof gallons, shall also be stated; and such further particulars shall be entered in the warehouse books as may be prescribed or found necessary for the identification of the packages, to insure the correct delivery thereof and proper accountability therefor. And every store-keeper shall furnish daily to the collector of the district a return of all articles received in and delivered from the warehouse during the day preceding that on which the return is made, and mail at the same time a copy thereof to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and shall, on the first Monday of every month, make a report in duplicate of the number of packages of all articles, with the respective descriptions thereof, as above provided, which remained in the warehouse at the date of his last report, of all articles received therein and delivered therefrom during the preceding month, and of articles remaining therein at the end of said month. He shall deliver one of these reports to the collector having control of the warehouse, to be recorded and filed in his office, and transmit one to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be recorded and filed in his office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3366 by striking out in line 7 the word "complete," and inserting the words "true and exact;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3366. Every person who makes or distills spirits, or owns any still, boiler, or other vessel used for the purpose of distilling spirits, or who has such still, boiler, or other vessel so used under his superintendence, either as agent or owner, or who uses any such still, boiler, or other vessel, shall from day to day make, or cause to be made, in a book or books, to be kept by him in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, a true and exact entry of the kind of materials, and the quantity in pounds, bushels, or gallons purchased by him for the production of spirits, from whom and when purchased, and by what conveyance delivered at said distillery, the amount paid therefor, the kind and quantity of fuel purchased for use in the distillery, and from whom purchased, the amount paid for ice or water for use in the distillery, the repairs placed on said distillery or distilling apparatus, the cost thereof, and by whom and when made, and of the name and residence of each person employed in or about the distillery, and in what capacity employed. And in another book he shall make like entry of the quantity of grain or other material used for the production of spirits, the time of day when any yeast or other composition is put into any mash or beer for the purpose of exciting fermentation, the quantity of mash in each tub, designating the same by the number of the tub, the number of dry inches, that is to say, the number of inches between the top of each tub and the surface of the mash or beer therein at the time of yeasting, the gravity and temperature of the time of yeasting, and on every day thereafter its quantity, gravity, and temperature at the hour of twelve meridian; also, of the time when any fermenting-tub is emptied of ripe mash or beer, the number of gallons of spirits distilled, the number of gallons placed in the warehouse, and the proof thereof, the number of gallons sold or removed, with the proof thereof, and the name, place of business, and residence of the person to whom sold.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3368 by striking out in line 3 the word "four," and inserting the word "two;" so as to read "in the two preceding sections."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3372 by striking out in line 11 the word "assessor" and inserting "Commissioner."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3377, line 16, after the word "allowed" to insert "provided, that the total net compensation to collectors as fixed by this title shall not be thereby increased;" so it will read:

SEC. 3377. The books of tax-paid stamps issued to any collector shall be charged to his account at the full value of the tax on the number of gallons represented on the stamps and coupons contained in said books; and every collector shall make a monthly return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of all tax-paid stamps issued by him to be affixed to any cask or package containing distilled spirits on which the tax has been paid, and account for the amount of the tax collected; and when the said collector returns to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue any book of marginal stubs, which it shall be his duty to do as soon as all the stamps contained in the book when issued to him have been used, and accounts for the tax on the number of gallons represented on the stamps and coupons that were contained in said book, there shall be allowed to the collector a commission of $\frac{1}{2}$ of one per cent. on the amount of such tax, in addition to any other commission by law allowed: Provided, That the total net compensation to collectors as fixed by this title shall not be thereby increased.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to insert in section 3381, line 17, after the word "person," the words "or firm;" so it will read:

SEC. 3381. Every rectifier and wholesale liquor dealer shall provide a book, to be prepared and kept in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and shall, on the same day on which he receives any foreign or domestic spirits, and before he draws off any part thereof, or adds water or anything thereto, or in any respect alters the same, enter in such book, and in the proper columns respectively prepared for the purpose, the date when, the name of the person or firm from whom, and the place whence the spirits were received, by whom distilled, rectified, or compounded, and when and by whom inspected, and, if in the original package, the serial number of each package, the number of wine gallons and proof gallons, the kind of spirit, and the number and kind of adhesive stamps thereon. And every such rectifier and wholesale dealer shall, at the time of sending out of his stock or possession any spirits, and before the same are removed from his premises, enter in like manner in the said book the day when and the name and place of business of the person or firm to whom such spirits are to be sent, the quantity and kind or quality of such spirits, the number of gallons and fractions of a gallon at proof, and, if in the original packages in which they were received, the name of the distiller and the serial number of the package, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3386, in lines 1, 2, and 4, respectively, to insert the words "cask or" before the word "package."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The same word "package" occurs in line 12.

Mr. PENDLETON. I suppose the words "cask or" should be inserted there also. I make that amendment. The section would then read:

SEC. 3386. All distilled spirits drawn from any cask or package and placed in any other cask or package containing not less than ten gallons, and intended for sale, shall be again inspected and gauged; and the cask or package into which it is so transferred shall be marked or branded, and such marking or branding shall distinctly indicate the name of the gauger, the time and place of inspection, the proof of the spirits, the particular name of such spirits as known to the trade, and the name and place of business of the dealer or rectifier, as the case may be; and, except where such spirits have been rectified or compounded, the name also of the distiller and the distillery where such spirits were produced, and the serial number of the original cask or package; and where such spirits have been rectified, the name of the rectifier, and the serial number of the rectifier's stamp; and the absence of such mark or brand shall be held as sufficient cause and evidence for the forfeiture of such unmarked packages of spirits.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3385, line 2, to strike out the word "three;" so it will read:

SEC. 3385. All blanks in any of the forms prescribed in the preceding sections shall be duly filled in accordance with the facts in each case. And the stamps therein designated shall in every case be affixed to a smooth surface of the cask or other package, which surface shall not have been previously painted or covered with any substance, and so as to fasten the same securely to the cask or package, and shall be duly canceled, and shall then be immediately covered with a coating of transparent varnish or other substance, so as to protect them from removal or damage by exposure; and such affixing, cancellation, and covering shall be done in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may by regulation prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3395, line 5, to insert before "one hundred" the words "less than;" so it will read:

SEC. 3395. When a judgment of forfeiture, in any case of seizure, is recovered against any distillery used or fit for use in the production of distilled spirits, because no bond has been given, or against any distillery used or fit for use in the production of spirits, having a registered producing-capacity of less than one hundred and fifty gallons a day, for any violation of law, of whatever nature, every still, doubler, worm, worm-tub, mash-tub, and fermenting-tub therein, shall be so destroyed as to prevent the use of the same or of any part thereof for the purpose of distilling; and the materials shall be sold as in case of other forfeited property.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move, in section 3396, line 2, after the word "warehouse," to insert the words "or other warehouse for distilled spirits authorized by law;" so it will read:

SEC. 3396. Whenever seizure is made of any distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a distillery or distillery warehouse, or other warehouse for distilled spirits authorized by law, or than in the store or place of business of a rectifier, or of a wholesale liquor dealer, or than in transit from any one of said places; or of any distilled spirits found in any one of the places aforesaid, or in transit therefrom, which have not been received into or sent out therefrom in conformity to law, or in regard to which any of the entries required by law to be made in the books of the owner of such spirits, or of the store-keeper, wholesale dealer, or rectifier, have not been made at the time or in the manner required, or in respect to which the owner or person having possession, control, or charge of said spirits, has omitted to do any act required to be done, or has done or committed any act prohibited in regard to said spirits, the burden of proof shall be upon the claimant of said spirits to show that no fraud has been committed, and that all the requirements of the law in relation to the payment of the tax have been complied with.

The amendment was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. POLAND, (at twenty minutes past nine o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Also, the petition of Mary D. Williams, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 5, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM HARRIS, D. D., of London, a member of the recent Evangelical Alliance, on behalf of the Congregationalists of Great Britain.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress for an increase of the currency of the country.

Whereas the real and personal property of the country has increased nearly 100 per cent. in the last decade, and the value of manufactured products more than double during the same time, while the amount of currency in circulation has been contracted about two hundred and fifty millions; and whereas we believe the amount of currency in the country, and especially in the Northwest, is inadequate to carry on the exchanges necessary for a healthy and prosperous condition of affairs, and however desirable it may be to bring about specie payment, an undue contraction of the legal-tenders of the country by which business is embarrassed and production impaired is not the proper method of obtaining that end: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That we request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for such measures of relief as the present condition of the country demands, prominent among which we believe is a large addition to the present volume of the currency of the country.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby instructed to furnish each of our members in Congress with twenty-five copies of this resolution.

Approved February 27, 1874.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the petition of A. M. Rice and Nathaniel Church, and others, of Little Compton, Rhode Island, praying that, in view of the happy issue of our late arbitration with Great Britain, Congress take measures to invite the other nations to seek an express stipulation for arbitration, and that they will not resort to war till peaceful arbitration has been tried, and never without a full year's previous notice. I move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of the State executive committee of civil rights of the State of Rhode Island, praying the Senate to pass Senator CHARLES SUMNER'S supplementary civil-rights bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia, directing its Senators and requesting its Members of the House of Representatives to favor the passage of an act providing for the holding of an annual session of the district court at Martinsburgh, West Virginia. I will state that now the nearest district court from Martinsburgh is two hundred miles, and on this side of the mountains. There appears to be a necessity for a court there. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying that the money-order system be extended to every post-office in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the petition of Isaac M. Hall and other citizens of Groton, Vermont, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOREMAN presented a resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia, in favor of the passage of an act providing for the holding of an annual session of the district court for the district of West Virginia, at Martinsburgh, in the county of Berkeley; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LEWIS presented the petition of Frank G. Senseny and others, heirs of Jacob Senseny, deceased, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of certain buildings in Winchester, Virginia, by United States troops, in 1864 and 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of the members and congregation of the Methodist Episcopal church of Franklin, Richland County, Ohio, signed by the pastor, Rev. John McNabb, and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society, William B. Spooner, president, William C. Greene, secretary, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of George Frances and 48 others, and the petition of Emry C. Games, and 68 others, citizens of Delaware, praying the passage of the bill known as CHARLES SUMNER'S supplementary civil-rights bill; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present a large number of petitions from citizens of Massachusetts, in different towns, interested in patents, in which they set forth abuses from the extension of patents, by means of which monopolists have enriched themselves to the extent of several million dollars; and they protest against such extensions, and request the Senate and House of Representatives, and particularly those members whose constituents they are, to use their earnest endeavors and influence to relieve them from such further onerous burdens. I move to refer the petitions to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of George Carpenter and others, citizens of Groton, Vermont, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SCHURZ presented the petition of Patrick Sullivan, late lieutenant Nineteenth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, praying compensation for services rendered in recruiting men for the Army in 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Elizabeth Haines, a nurse in the United States hospital at Keokuk, Iowa, praying that a pension be granted her for disability contracted in the United States service and in the line of duty, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of R. W. Gibbs be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the petition of George R. Naylor be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That the pension certificate of Mrs. Barbara A. Nock be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and delivered to her, to enable her to draw her pension.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the matter of the claim of the Methodist Episcopal Church South be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 351) to amend an act entitled "An act confirming and extending a patent right to Levi W. Pond and the Eau Claire Lumber Company," approved June 10, 1872, to report it back with the recommendation that it be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I do not ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed, but rejected. On a former occasion the Senate decided that a bill indefinitely postponed might be called up at any time by a mere majority of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, then, is on the third reading of the bill.

The question being put was determined in the negative, and so the bill was rejected.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. The same committee make the same report in regard to the bill (S. No. 352) to repeal an act entitled "An act confirming and extending a patent right to Levi W. Pond and the Eau Claire Lumber Company," approved June 10, 1872. It is another form of the same matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to a third reading.

The question being put, the bill was rejected.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred a number of petitions, asking that the postal money-order system be extended to all the post-offices in the country, have instructed me to report adversely to the prayer of the petitions and ask to be discharged from their further consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. In that connection I desire to have printed a communication from the Post-Office Department on this subject, which I present.

The communication was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 919) to provide for the issuing and recording of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, reported it without amendment.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Lucinda Schrom, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 566) granting a pension to Lucinda Schrom, widow of Jacob R. Schrom, late of Company A, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Hester Stoll, praying for a pension, reported it adversely, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary E. Naylor, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 567) granting a pension to Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, late a private in Company C, Second Kansas Militia.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Hugh P. Lytle, praying for a pension, reported a bill (S. No. 568) granting a pension to Hugh P. Lytle, late private Company H, Thirty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteers; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 375) for the benefit of the Kentucky Agricultural and Mechanical Association, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. McCREERY, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 496) for the relief of those suffering from the destruction of the salt-works, near Manchester, Kentucky, pursuant to the orders of Major-General Carlos Buell, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOREMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 569) to compensate J. B. Davis & Brothers for rent and damage to their property in New Creek, West Virginia, by the United States troops during the late war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 570) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for the better protection of the Indian tribes therein, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEWIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 571) to authorize the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to construct a branch, and to change the location of its road within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 572) to authorize the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to construct a lateral railroad within the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 573) for the relief of Henry B. Reese, paymaster, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COOPER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 574) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPRAGUE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 575) giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation; which was read twice by its title, and, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 576) to provide for deductions from terms of sentence of United States prisoners, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 577) for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 578) granting a pension to Elizabeth Leebrick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 279) to authorize the issue of swamp-land indemnity certificates, and their location by actual settlers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TIMBER ON WESTERN PRAIRIES.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this motion?

Mr. WRIGHT. There is.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I would state that there is a general desire in the Northwest to have this bill passed to perfect an act of the last Congress. The modifications of the Senate and House are very immaterial as to principle; and it is very necessary to act on the bill soon, as the season is rapidly approaching when the planting of trees will be too late. Northwestern Senators especially should permit this bill to be considered now and passed upon, on that account.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I certainly have no objection to this particular bill, and I do not know but that I shall support it as cordially as any Senator; but I object to taking up this bill when we have had the bill known as the commission bill before the Senate for several mornings, and when I am sure the Senate is getting tired of it, as I am. I want to have that bill up as soon as possible and have it disposed of, and I trust nothing will be allowed to interfere with it. I know nothing about the merits of this bill; I have no doubt but that I shall be in favor of it, judging from its title, but I insist on proceeding with the Calendar.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I will state to the Senate that the bill will occupy but very little time. The amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands are simply to put the bill in working order. There will be no controversy about it. All that will be necessary will be to read the bill, with such explanations as a word can give, and it will be passed in concurrence with the House. It is a House bill in which all the western members must be necessarily very much interested.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same thing occurred here on Tuesday morning. A bill which it was said would not take three minutes was taken up and occupied three-quarters of an hour. I cannot tell how long this bill will occupy; but I cannot consent that it shall displace the regular order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies."

The first section amends the act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies, approved March 3, 1873, so as to read as follows:

That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and is a citizen of the United States, or who shall have filed his declaration of intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, who shall plant, protect, and keep in a healthy, growing condition for eight years, forty acres of timber, the trees thereon not being more than twelve feet apart each way, on any quarter-section of any of the public lands of the United States, or twenty acres on any legal subdivision of eighty acres, or ten acres on any legal subdivision of forty acres, or one-fourth part of any fractional subdivision of land less than forty acres, shall be entitled to a patent for the whole of said quarter-section, or of such legal subdivision of eighty or forty acres, or fractional subdivision of less than forty acres, as the case may be, at the expiration of said eight years, on making proof of such fact by not less than two credible witnesses: Provided, That not more than one quarter of any section shall be thus granted, and that no person shall make more than one entry under the provisions of this act, unless fractional subdivisions of less than forty acres are entered which, in the aggregate, shall not exceed one quarter-section.

The second section provides that a person applying for the benefit of the act shall, upon application to the register of the land district in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the register, or the receiver, or some officer authorized to administer oaths in the district where the land is situated, who is required by law to use an official seal, that the entry is made for the cultivation of timber, and upon filing such affidavit and on payment of ten dollars, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land specified; and the party making an entry of a quarter-section shall be required to break ten acres of the land covered thereby the first year, ten acres the second year, and twenty acres the third year after date of entry, and to plant ten acres of timber the second year, ten acres the third year, and twenty acres the fourth year after date of entry. A party making an entry of eighty acres shall break and plant, at the times prescribed, one-half of the quantity required of a party who enters a quarter-section; and a party entering forty acres shall break and plant, at the times prescribed, one-quarter of the quantity required of a party who enters a quarter-section or a proportionate quantity for any smaller fractional subdivision, but no final certificate shall be given or patent issued for the land so entered until the expiration of eight years from the date of the entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, or at any time within three years thereafter, the person making such entry, or if he or she be dead, his or her heirs or legal representatives, shall prove by two credible witnesses that he or she or they have planted, and, for not less than eight years, have cultivated and protected the quantity and character of timber stated, they shall receive a patent for such quarter-section or legal subdivision of eighty or forty acres of land, or for any fractional quantity of less than forty acres.

The third section provides that if at any time after the filing of the affidavit, and prior to the issuing of the patent, it shall be proved, after due notice to the party making such entry and claiming to cultivate such timber, to the satisfaction of the register and the receiver of the land office, subject to appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that such person has abandoned the land, or failed to do the breaking and planting required, or failed to cultivate, protect, and keep in good condition such timber, then the entry shall be canceled, and the land shall revert to the United States, and become subject to disposal as other public lands, unless again entered, under the provisions of the act, within the period of two years after such cancellation.

The fourth section declares that every person who, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, or any amendment thereto, has a homestead on the public domain, and who, at any time after the end of the third year of his or her residence thereon, shall, in addition to the settlement and improvements now required by law, have had under cultivation, for two years, one acre of timber, the trees thereon not being more than twelve feet apart each way, and in a good, thrifty condition, for each and every sixteen acres of the homestead, shall, upon due proof of such fact by two credible witnesses, receive his or her patent for the homestead.

The fifth section declares that no land acquired under the provisions of the act shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of certificate therefor.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office is, by the sixth section, required to prepare and issue such rules and regulations, consistent with the act, as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was to add to section 2 of the bill the following:

And in case of the death of a person who has complied with the provisions of this act for the period of three years, his heirs or legal representatives shall have the option to comply with the provisions of this act, and receive, at the expiration of eight years, a patent for one hundred and sixty acres, or receive without delay a patent for forty acres, relinquishing all claim to the remainder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 3, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That if, at any time after the filing of said affidavit, and prior to the issuing of the patent for said land, the claimant shall abandon the land, or fail to do the breaking and planting required by this act, or any part thereof, or shall fail to cultivate, protect, and keep in good condition such timber, then, and in that event, such land shall be subject to entry under the homestead laws, or by some other person under the provisions of this act: Provided, That the party making claim to said land, either as a homestead settler or under this act, shall give, at the time of filing his application, such notice to the original claimant as shall be prescribed by the rules established by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the rights of the parties shall be determined as in other contested cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to propose an amendment on page 3, line 27 of section 2, to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to read:

And if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within five years thereafter, the person making such entry, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. PRATT. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up a few pension cases which have originated in the Senate, and it is important that the bills shall pass and be sent to the House. They are only five in number. There is a printed report in each case, and I do not suppose any objection to the merits will be preferred by any Senator. I hope the indulgence of the Senate will be given me for a moment to take them up. I call for the first bill, (S. No. 477,) granting a pension to Jemima Maxwell.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose it will not avail to make an objection, but I must interpose it and take the sense of the Senate again as to whether they will postpone what I regard as really the regular order, the Calendar, and take up bills out of their order. I appeal to the friends of the pending bill, on the call of the Calendar, if they propose to pass it or have action on it, to stand by it and get it out of the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish the Senator from Iowa might have some day assigned for the consideration of his bill. I am in favor of the bill, but we have devoted the morning hour for some time, very profitably indeed, to the consideration of unobjected cases, and I think it ought to be saved for that purpose, and that long and contested cases should have a proper place assigned them. I will vote to take up the bill of the Senator from Iowa at any time. I will vote, as soon as the bill in which the Senator from Pennsylvania is so much interested is out of the way, that we shall proceed with the bill of the Senator from Iowa; but I really think the morning hour ought to be given to uncontested cases.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should be very willing indeed if I could get the consent of the Senate to fix some time when the bill shall be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill for a commission in regard to intoxicating liquors may be considered as in order after the centennial bill is disposed of. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. If there be no objection the bills indicated by the Senator from Indiana will be proceeded with.

JEMIMA MAXWELL.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 477) granting a pension to Jemima Maxwell was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Interior is by the bill directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jemima Maxwell, widow of John Maxwell, deceased, late of Company D, Fifth Missouri State Militia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed

JOHN A. FISHER.

Mr. PRATT. Now I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to John A. Fisher.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John A. Fisher, late first lieutenant in Company D, Twenty-third Regiment Missouri Volunteers, and to pay him such pension as that allowed to the class of pensioners with which his present disability would class him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN C. SKINNER.

Mr. PRATT. The next case is Senate bill No. 518.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 518) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Skinner was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the name of Benjamin C. Skinner, late of Company K, Fourteenth Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers, and to allow him a pension of eight dollars per month from and after the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EUGENE SMITH.

Mr. PRATT. The next case is Senate bill No. 539.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 539) granting a pension to Eugene Smith was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eugene Smith, late of Company F, First Nebraska Veteran Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FANNY NEWCOMB.

Mr. PRATT. The next and last case for to-day is Senate bill No. 540.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 540) granting a pension to Fanny Newcomb, mother of Irenus Newcomb, late of Company H, Sixth Regiment Vermont Volunteers, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the Committee on Printing, instructed by the Senate to make a contract for reporting the debates of the Senate during the Forty-third Congress, have entered into a contract with Mr. Dennis F. Murphy, who has long been the reporter of the Senate, and whose qualifications are too well known to all Senators for me to eulogize them. This contract proposes to pay to Mr. Murphy the sum named in the law referred to in the resolution directing the contract to be made. This is, I believe, $4,000 per Congress less than we have been actually paying, and it is also about $8,000 per Congress less than the House of Representatives has been paying for the same service. In the committee of conference, of which the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] was chairman, there was a consultation held with the reporter on the part of the Senate, and one on the part of the House, and that was the sum for which they consented they would perform the service, although they thought it was lower than it ought to be; and the committee thought on the whole that would be about right.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the service to be performed?

Mr. ANTHONY. To report the debates and supply them to any person whom Congress may authorize to print them.

Mr. CONKLING. They will continue to be printed at the Government Printing Office unless by future action we order otherwise?

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly. The mode and place of printing are left entirely to the discretion of Congress, but the reports are to be made entirely by Mr. Murphy, or at least under his responsibility. The committee thought it better to contract with one man than to contract with a number of persons.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this for both Houses?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; for the Senate. The House of Representatives have a different arrangement. I make this statement, perhaps not necessarily, as we have been authorized and directed to make a contract, but before the contract was signed I desired the Senate to know what it was; and, in the language of the Prayer-Book, I will say, "If any man know just cause or impediment why this contract should not be entered into let him speak now, or ever after hold his peace."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. With that large liberty which is invited, I should like to ask the Senator one question; and that is whether this contract is made in harmony with the legislation which passed Congress in the early part of the session?

Mr. ANTHONY. Precisely. It is in accordance with all the legislation on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has it been read?

Mr. ANTHONY. It has not been read. It is a contract which can be read if the Senator desires.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it does not conform to the law my colleagues on the Committee on Printing are responsible. Being a legal document, I have intrusted that part of it entirely to them. The only thing I have endeavored to secure myself was, that in case Congress should become bankrupt, as there seems to be danger of it, I should not be held personally responsible to Mr. Murphy for the money. I believe I am safe there.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator from Rhode Island rise to a personal matter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island offer a resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have made a verbal report.

Mr. BAYARD. From the language used I thought possibly he was making publication of his own bans. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope it may prove so; but I submit that in that case I am entitled to have a different party to the contract. [Laughter.]

LIQUOR-TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic.

Several SENATORS. That was postponed.

Mr. SHERMAN. We might as well finish that now as at any other time. The debate is exhausted I trust.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance as amended by the Senate.

The amendment to the amendment of the committee, as amended, was read, being in section 2, line 2, after the word "salary," to insert "all of whom shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation or total abstinence in relation to alcoholic or fermented liquors."

Mr. HOWE. I tried yesterday, under great difficulties, to state one or two objections I had to that amendment; and I will make another diligent effort to-day, with the permission of the Senate.

This bill proposes to authorize the appointment of a commission. A commission to do what? To investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic, in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and the criminal to be arraigned is Alcohol. Now, what sort of a commission? The bill says that the commissioners shall be "selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation"—an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation of the conduct and merits of this criminal, Alcohol; and the honorable Senator from Delaware, for the first time, I believe, in the history of this Government, proposes to prescribe a qualification for those who are to fill the offices which this bill creates. I do not know that an attempt of that kind has been made heretofore by law. Something kindred to it perhaps is attempted by what are known as the civil-service rules.

Now, we are creating an office and proposing to direct the President as to the qualifications, or one qualification, that some of the officers shall have. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware is to declare that all these commissioners "shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation or total abstinence in relation to alcoholic or fermented liquors;" in other words, that some portion of this commission shall be composed of men who are not advocates of total abstinence and not advocates of prohibitory legislation. The bill as it stands says that the commissioners shall all be honest and all be impartial; and the Senator from Delaware would have us add that at least a part of them shall not be the advocates of prohibitory legislation or advocates of total abstinence.

I said yesterday that if you want to do anything more to secure an impartial investigation than to adopt the language of the bill as it now stands, you must not adopt the amendment of the Senator from Delaware without adding something to it. If you want to be absolutely sure that there will be friends of total abstinence as well as the opponents of total abstinence on the commission, then you must say so; and when you tell the President that he shall appoint a part of the commission from those who are the opponents of total abstinence, tell him also that he must put on some who are the friends of total abstinence. The expression of one thing, it is suggested to me, excludes the other. So the Senator from New York reminds me; and so I was afraid that when you proposed by an amendment expressly to tell the President that he must put some good free-drinker on the commission, that might be held by some strict constructionists as telling him that he must exclude everybody else from the commission. I think we should guard against that if we want an impartial investigation.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. How are you going to find out as to that?

Mr. HOWE. I thank my friend from Connecticut for suggesting that difficulty. It had occurred to me before, but I forgot to speak of it. How is the President going to determine this qualification? That is a very grave inquiry. Certainly it ought to be determined by a competitive examination, I should suppose. The different candidates to fill that portion of the commission provided for in the amendment of the Senator from Delaware ought to be brought before a committee, and the committee ought to be able to tell which three of those candidates were the three who could drink the most; and I suppose the President ought to be required to select one of the three. [Laughter.] I said for one I did not care to have so impartial an investigation as this.

The Senator from New York yesterday took occasion to protest the sincerity of his friendship for temperance, and for temperance reform. I was sorry that he felt any necessity for making such an affirmation, and I was the more sorry that, if he found it necessary to affirm his sincerity, he should not have found some better standard by which to test it than he found in myself. He seemed to think he had done enough to vouch for it when he said he was as sincere and honest as myself. I think if the country needs any assurance from him, it will need something much more positive and unqualified and specific than that. I do not pretend to be a reformer of any description; I am a republican. I do not pretend to be a temperance lecturer; I am a mere legislator. I do not stand here in the interest of the temperance reform or any other reform.

A great mass of the people of the United States seem to be of the opinion that I, in common with my colleagues on this floor, have not understood our whole duty as law-makers. They think that if they were permitted to make some inquiries and to collect some facts touching this great criminal, they could enlighten me and my friends about me as to our duty. I am willing they should have that opportunity. I want them to have it. If I do not understand my duty, I would like to be made to see it better. I have one idea, I suppose, in common with that of every Senator here, that among all the criminals who stalk abroad in this country Alcohol is one of the greatest. I did not gather that idea from the Philadelphia platform. I entertained that notion before I ever read the Philadelphia platform. And I did not discover anything in the Baltimore platform, let me say, by the way, which disturbed that idea at all, or eradicated it. I believe that it is a great criminal. I believe it is the progenitor of more pauperism, of more crime, of more villainy of every known variety, than any other one criminal that we know anything about; and if there are in the United States citizens who, by long and careful consideration or by inquiry, by the examination of witnesses, can collect for us any facts, and can show the Legislature of the United States any way in which this criminal can be checked in his career, I shall be glad to find it.

But why have two classes of opinion on the question of total abstinence represented on the commission? Is there any sort of danger that this Senate will be thrown into a frenzy of devotion to total abstinence by any report that may be made by any possible commission? I have not any alarm on that score myself. However single-minded this commission may be, however devoted they may be to the cause of total abstinence or to the cause of prohibitory legislation, there is nothing in the bill to show that any member of the commission will be in favor of the one or the other of these principles. But suppose them all to be so, I have not the slightest apprehension that they will carry the Senate of the United States off its feet. The career of the Senate for seventy-five years I think furnishes an abundant guarantee that we shall not strike through the Constitution even to reach so flagitious a felon as Alcohol is. If there are those in the United States, therefore, who are opposed to total abstinence, who are opposed to prohibitory legislation, I think they can afford to trust the Senate; they will find friends enough in the Senate. They can rely upon me. I am not likely to betray them. So that you see I do not want in this sense an impartial investigation. I want it to represent one view; I want it directed to one end; and if it reach that end it will be all the more satisfactory to me, I feel free to say.

Mr. President, for these reasons, I shall vote against this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say one word, which I believe will provoke no reply. The only practical objection I have heard to this amendment came to me this morning from a friend greatly interested in the cause of temperance, who suggested that if such a requirement was made, and men not specially temperance men should refuse to serve, it might prevent the other commissioners from proceeding. I simply call attention to that to say that the refusal of one to act would not, as I understand, hinder for a moment the proceedings of the rest; and if, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, it would be a matter of course to put on somebody from one side as well as the other, if there are sides, then certainly this amendment can do no harm.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Robertson, Schurz, Stewart, and Stockton—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Cameron, Conover, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Sumner, Windom, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Carpenter, Chandler, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and West—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour having expired it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned yesterday I was calling attention to some remarks of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] I am glad those remarks are in print now, so that there will be no misunderstanding of what he said. I agree with a portion of what he said; but I proceed to call his attention to that portion of his speech with which I differ. He says:

> The main objection against this exhibition, originating with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] and adopted by the Senators from Nevada, and Kentucky, and Ohio, is that it would be contrary to good taste, refined delicacy; that it would in fact be impolite for us to invite the representatives of other nations to stand on our broad continent while we celebrated somewhere our jubilee of liberty. Why, sir, such exquisiteness would become girls of sixteen, but not us. Mr. President, does any one suppose that it is proposed to have a saturnalia of vulgar boasting in the very aisles and walks of the exhibition; that it is the purpose to visit the alcoves and tables of our guests with drum and fife and din "Hail Columbia" and the "Star-Spangled Banner" into their ears; that we intend to have a corps of Fourth of July orators to harangue them, or a flock of American eagles to prey upon them? I trust something may be left to the good sense, to the good breeding, and to the native politeness of the American people.

I had supposed that if we were to appropriate a large amount of money for the purpose of furnishing these halls and paving these walks and cushioning these alcoves with greenbacks, if we cannot have hard money, and preparing these tables, we might, on that occasion, sing "Hail Columbia" and whistle "Yankee Doodle." I had supposed we might, over the results of our greenbacks, go to Philadelphia and sing national songs, and we might have Fourth of July orators on that occasion. I know no more appropriate occasion than the Fourth of July for Fourth of July orators; but we are told it would be bad taste to have vulgar Fourth of July orators. They cannot be there because it would offend foreign princes. We should have too much exquisite taste to do that.

Then we cannot have the American eagle there. The Fourth of July without the drum and fife and "Hail Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle" and the American eagle, it seems to me, would be the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out. I thought, perhaps, that I had mistaken all this thing, that I was entirely lost about celebrating the Fourth of July, and that I had been dreaming all the time; but this morning I sent to the Library to see what had been said on Fourth of July occasions by men who are regarded as patriots and who ought to be regarded as good examples. Take any of them; they are all about the same. I have examined some dozen Fourth of July orations, and I find them all flourishing the American eagle and speaking of "Hail Columbia," and having it sung at intervals; and I find them doing all those things which the Senator from New Jersey says we shall have too much good taste to venture to do in the aisles and about the walks and about the tables and the alcoves of our guests which we are asking this appropriation to furnish.

John Quincy Adams delivered an oration in this city in 1821, and according to the Senator from New Jersey, if I have not misread his speech—and I have read it over this morning—it would be very much out of taste; it has got too much of the American eagle; it has got too much of the praise of liberty and republicanism in it to be agreeable on such an occasion. I will read one passage to show what he said, and ascertain whether that would be the doctrine we should contend for if we invited European nations to listen. We are inviting their governments; we are not inviting the people; we have a standing invitation to the people, and they are coming by millions. They come here and enjoy the blessings of our liberty, and participate in the freedom that we enjoy, and help to render our country still greater, and to extend its blessings. What did Mr. Adams say about it? I read from his oration of July 4, 1821. Referring to the Declaration of Independence, he says:

> The interest which in this paper has survived the occasion upon which it was issued; the interest which is of every age and every clime; the interest which quickens with the lapse of years, spreads as it grows old, and brightens as it recedes, is in the principles which it proclaims. It was the first solemn declaration by a nation of the only legitimate foundation of civil government. It was the corner-stone of a new fabric, destined to cover the surface of the globe. It demolished at a stroke the lawfulness of all governments founded upon conquest. It swept away all the rubbish of accumulated centuries of servitude. It announced in practical form to the world the transcendent truth of the inalienable sovereignty of the people.

How will that sound to those who do not believe at all in the inalienable sovereignty of the people? How will that sound to those who believe in the divine right of kings? I do not wonder that the Senator from New Jersey suggested that it would be improper for Fourth of July orators to go about the aisles, the alcoves, or walks of this international exposition, if they are going to talk such talk as that. Then John Quincy Adams did another thing which would certainly call for action on the part of the police of Philadelphia. You will be astonished when you find the fact that on that occasion, and it is incorporated as part of his speech, he read the Declaration of Independence, which enumerates the wrongs that we suffered, which denounces tyrants in the strongest terms and in the most statesman-like way; which is an uncomfortable doctrine to them, to which they have not become reconciled yet, and will not become reconciled if you bring them here. They will never be reconciled to that Declaration which he read on that occasion.

I undertake to say it is all very well if persons believing in aristocratic institutions come here of their own accord, or come here as representatives of their governments, and voluntarily listen to such discourses as these and others that must be delivered on that occasion; but I say there is an incongruity in inviting them here to hear them. If your invitation was extended to the downtrodden people of Europe, if it was extended to those who seek to throw off the forms of government under which they live and adopt ours, to those who believe that the sovereignty ought of right to be in the people, there would be some fitness and appropriateness in the invitation which would strike everybody. But we are called upon by the proposed law to do what? We may as well understand exactly what is proposed, because heretofore we went on without understanding, and I called attention to the fact when these proceedings were being hurried through that the matter was not sufficiently considered, and I was almost the only one except the Senator from New York who called attention to the way the legislation was being had at the time. I say if we are to go further, let us know what we are doing and for what we are doing it. Let it be discussed like all other questions. Here is the bill:

That the President be requested to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the year 1876.

This invitation is to be extended to the governments, and it is to take part in an international exposition, and not in a celebration; and yet we are all the time talking about a celebration. We are going to depart from the celebration altogether, and have an international exhibition. The celebration is to be excluded. If the people want to celebrate the day, they must go elsewhere. The seats which they fill with this money are to be occupied by a class of persons that does not want to listen to the celebration. The idea is not a celebration at all, but an international exhibition. The patriotic people who wish to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of our independence are not to be there. Fourth of July orators and the American eagle are to be excluded, unless we bring the English lion and all the balance of them, and parade them around. We might have an eagle with a lion's skin on, or something of that kind. But that day, if it is to be commemorated at all, should be commemorated as the birthday of American liberty. It should be free to every one who desires to rejoice in the principles of American liberty; it should be free to every one who wishes to boast, if you please—call it vulgar boasting if you choose—who wishes to boast of the struggle of our ancestry. Suppose our people do say some extravagant things, they have never done any harm on that day; but we are to have that building put up and occupied by persons who cannot listen to these orations, who cannot listen to these boasts, who cannot afford to have the American eagle put before them, unless you put up all the flags of the earth, and call the affair "international!" We may as well understand this matter. Now that we have got it under review we had better get it right. We had better know exactly what we are going to have, what kind of an entertainment we are to have. When the original bill of 1871 was before the Senate, prior to its passage I called attention to it in this way:

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, when it was proposed to hold an exposition of this sort in the city of Washington I opposed it, not because I was opposed to Washington, but because I thought it would be a failure here; because I thought Washington had not the requisite facilities for having such a celebration. Now the proposition is to have it in Philadelphia. Philadelphia is much better adapted to the purpose than Washington; but I doubt very much whether Philadelphia has the facilities to get up a celebration that New York has. New York appears to present greater advantages. It seems to me this is a serious matter, and that it should not be hurried through too rapidly. If it is to be done by private subscription, if the people are to do it, it seems to me New York is much better able to make an exhibition that will be creditable to the United States than any other city of the Union.

Mr. WILSON. Except Boston.

Mr. STEWART. I think it has more wealth and power in that direction than Boston. If this exhibition is to be held, I should like to see it a creditable one. I consider it a matter of so much importance, without desiring to take part in the controversy between the two cities or to enter into any partisan conflict about it, that it seems to me the measure should be allowed to stand a sufficient time to have the country investigate it and say what would be most satisfactory to the whole Union, and the pride of the Union; because this matter is a matter of pride. Every American would be very sensitive about an international celebration. We want to make the best show we can, not only to gratify our pride, but in the interests of science, commerce, and civilization. When this exhibition is held we want the hearty co-operation of the whole nation. If the city of New York, the great center of commerce and trade, should feel itself slighted, it seems to me that would be a great damper to this thing in the start.

That is exactly what has occurred. But it was stated then that this was a mere local matter, a mere show in Philadelphia; that no money was asked from the Government; that Philadelphia was abundantly able to do all this. That is what was said; and it was stated here that it was immensely popular, that this scheme had the approval of the nation. If so, why does the plan that has been adopted invite the nation to participate? The Legislatures that elected us are in session, or soon will be in session, and they have a right to act on it. They have declined to act, not because they are not just as patriotic as we are. Not one of them has acted, I believe, except Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and there is no question, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] as to their power. We dare not question their patriotism; we dare not question their public spirit. They are the best judges of what they require. They have been requested to participate, but have declined or refused; and for that reason we are called upon here to compel our constituents, to compel the Legislatures, and compel the people of our States, to pay whether they desire to do so or not.

The plan has not been as popular as was anticipated. The plan of an international exhibition has not been sufficiently popular to receive a favorable response from the States and acquire the requisite aid. Consequently they say it is going to be a failure, unless Congress steps in. I think there is much objection to the plan. If it was to be an international exhibition, we should take the commercial center, the center of wealth, and then bestow all that we could upon it and make it a success. If it is to be a national celebration of the Fourth of July, the city of Philadelphia is the proper point. It is surrounded by memories that make it appropriate. They have a history there that makes it an appropriate place. As a national celebration it need not be very expensive; and I have no doubt if the people of the United States were simply called upon to appropriate their proportion for a national celebration, they would be willing that we should vote it. It need not be expensive; it need not require expensive buildings; it need not require a draft upon the Treasury that is to impoverish the country. It ought to have, and I think it would have, if started in the right direction, the co-operation of the whole country. But an international exhibition without the co-operation of the country is a mistake. After we have put it in this law that the Government of the United States shall not be called upon to contribute, it is now a mistake for us to undertake here to make a contribution which the States have refused, or at least neglected to make; and if you do it, you will find further difficulties in the way.

I am as anxious that the day of our centennial anniversary shall be properly celebrated as any one here. I am anxious that anything reasonable should be done; but an international exhibition is a matter of very great expense, and the States have signified that they do not feel willing to embark in the enterprise at this time. And when we are unable to resume specie payments, when we have a deficiency in the Treasury, and when the States have declined to go forward and take part in this exhibition under the plan proposed, it is no time for us to go forward and extend this invitation.

What does it involve? There is no use of passing over the matter lightly. This involves from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000; and if this invitation is extended, rather than have the United States disgraced, as it would be if the appropriation was not forthcoming, I should feel called upon to vote for an appropriation of $15,000,000, $20,000,000, or $25,000,000, if necessary. Then our honor would be really involved. If we authorize an invitation to all the nations to come here, we must provide the dinner; we must provide the entertainment. We should then be bound, as much as we should for any obligation of the country, if you once extend this invitation. It is a proposition involving fifteen or twenty million dollars. It could be held cheaper in New York, because there is more accommodation there; but we cannot do better. It could be held cheaper in Philadelphia than in Washington, and it could be held cheaper in Washington than in Alexandria; but in any place it is expensive.

If on that occasion people come here from Europe to see our national celebration without an invitation, they come of their own accord; they come to hear whatever we may say, the same as they come into these galleries. Then no man feels a restraint, and the Fourth of July orators are not excluded from the aisles, or the walks, or the avenues; nor is the American eagle excluded, nor "Hail Columbia," nor any of the accompaniments of a Fourth of July celebration.

The Senator from New Jersey further says—and this seems to me very remarkable:

The representatives of these people among us smile at the idea of our assuming that they admit we are better friends of civil liberty than they, and at our supposing that they will be offended at our celebration.

Of course if we invite them here we are not going to repel them. If we are to invite them we shall have to exclude anything in our discussion that is unfriendly to them. We shall have to exclude the discussion of the fundamental doctrine of republican liberty, that the people are sovereign. We cannot discuss that; we cannot invite them to discuss that; we have too much feeling for them. I simply say that the discussion that is appropriate to that occasion is incompatible with the invitation. That is all I say. There are plenty of subjects that we can discuss that would be agreeable to them, plenty of subjects that we have in common with them. We have a common interest in inventions, in the progress of the arts and sciences, and in the progress of civilization. We have plenty of subjects in harmony with them, and we are abundantly prepared, on a proper occasion, to have a national exhibition at which we can invite them and have it pleasant; but this particular idea of ours, this peculiar notion of ours, that no government not called by the will of the people is legitimate; that all authority not emanating directly from the people is usurpation; this particular notion of ours, which we want to discuss on our Fourths of July, is not the entertainment which will invite those who differ with us. It is a day of rejoicing, and we do not want to invite those who will not rejoice with us. If we do extend this invitation, and there is hesitation on the part of any one great power, it will mar it. Great Britain has not accepted it, and suppose she should not accept it, that will mar your international exhibition, for the idea of an international exhibition with Great Britain, the foremost commercial nation on the earth, left out; with our ancestors left out, with their progress, their history left out, is a kind of entertainment we do not want to see. When we have an international exhibition we want Great Britain here. We are now on the most cordial relations with Great Britain. We speak the same language, and we rejoice in many things in common in our literature and our laws. She is our neighbor in every sense of the word, and her people are our kinsfolk. We want them here, but we do not want to invite them to hear our Fourth of July orators speak of the injustice of that nation to us. We do not want to invite them here to draw a comparison between our free institutions and their aristocratic institutions; nor do we want to be debarred on the one hundredth anniversary from discussing those questions and speaking freely of them.

It seems to me that the first thing to do is to limit this celebration to a national character, and then limit its expense in such a manner as that the nation shall all join; and if you have a proposition upon which all agree you will get more money than you will by forcing this through with the country divided on this question. Suppose when the time comes one State is dissatisfied; then the whole thing is marred. We want on that day unanimity. We would rather go to Philadelphia; we would rather go to those sacred grounds, without a building erected; we would rather camp out there and enjoy the friendship and hospitality of that people in the open field, than to have any not there that we had invited, or any person contribute to it by force. We want no forced taxation for such an occasion as that. Let it come from the outgushing of the American heart, the patriotic heart, and you will get all the money necessary for such a purpose; but after having passed an act of Congress saying that the Government should not charge a cent to come here, if by the power of taxation you force them to contribute against the resolutions of States, and the protests of a large portion of the press, you will fail.

I am in favor of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American independence and American liberty, and will do anything that I can for the co-operation of the whole American people which will make it a great celebration. It was a false step to undertake it until the States had been more fully consulted, as it now appears. Perhaps some committee can devise a mode by which that step can be retraced, perhaps some committee can see what the country wants. Let us do that, and do it with the co-operation of all. As I said when the original bill was up, the mere dissatisfaction of the great city of New York would throw a damper upon the whole enterprise. Do we not see it now?

I would not be unjust to Pennsylvania. The Senator from New Jersey accused us of injustice to Pennsylvania. I will do as much as any one in my circumstances can to conduct this celebration in the proper form. It ought not to be regarded as specially the celebration of Pennsylvania or New Jersey. It should come in such a shape that it will be acceptable to the whole United States, and every man, woman, and child therein. We will have it in Philadelphia, but we do not want to see Pennsylvania taxed with it. We will have it there, where the Declaration of Independence was framed, which John Quincy Adams read in 1821 in this city, and commented on more eloquently than it is possible, I think, for almost any one now living to do. I say that we will have it where that Declaration was put forth; we will have it in Philadelphia. But we will take from it everything that divides the people of the United States. I would be satisfied, if I were from Pennsylvania and advocating this bill, and I would insist upon its taking such a shape as to receive the unanimous support of the States. But it has not received it, and I regret it.

I did not intend to say this much. I think the fact that the promoters of this scheme are forced to come here contrary to the provision they put into the law shows that they have not hit upon the right scheme. There is some defect in it; and that it is not popular through all the States we have had evidence. I think that fact should now at this late day lead to an investigation, because we do not want to adopt the scheme and have the investigation afterwards. We want the investigation now; we do not want an investigation as to how this money is applied after the exhibition; we want everybody satisfied beforehand. We do not want it called a job at a time when it will mar the pleasure of the nation.

That this celebration will be expensive, we have the examples of other international exhibitions. We have the statements from Paris, Vienna, and London, all involving really great expense. It is said it will be peaceful. I hope it will be peaceful; but peace has not followed those exhibitions heretofore. After the London exhibition they had the Crimean war, and after the Paris exhibition they had the Franco-German war and the overthrow of the empire. In Austria no great good has resulted from the Vienna exposition. They certainly did not improve their financial condition by it, for they had a financial pressure there last fall. They have not been specially benefited. We do not know whether it has promoted peace, whether there may not be heart-burnings growing out of its dissatisfactions, that may stir up wars in Europe hereafter or not. Many writers ascribe the downfall of Napoleon's dynasty in part to the pomp and splendor displayed on the occasion of the Paris exhibition, and the envy and ill-will there engendered against him. That may have had something to do with it; I do not know.

I do not know that such exhibitions are particularly in the interest of peace; still I think that an exhibition, under proper auspices, if the people of the United States could be brought to feel that they were abundantly able to unite on such a project to make it a grand success, would do well enough. But here, after a scheme has been proposed and the States have not adopted it, and after Congress has put a pledge in the law which it passed that it would not further tax the nation, now to ask us to extend an invitation involving $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, or at least $10,000,000 or $15,000,000, I am certain will meet with such opposition that we shall all be sorry it occurred.

I hope the bill will go to the committee, to be properly digested, and if they can come here with a plan by which Congress may do something that will be approved by the country, very well.

Mr. STOCKTON. I have an amendment to offer to the amendment of my colleague, which I send to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to add:

And with additional instructions that the exhibition to be held in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, shall be international in its character, so to exhibit the progress of the United States in the industries and arts beneficial to mankind, in comparison with those of older nations, as provided in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to ask the Clerk to read the original act of 1871, which I have in my hand, in explanation of that amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876.

Whereas the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America was prepared, signed, and promulgated in the year 1776, in the city of Philadelphia; and whereas it behooves the people of the United States to celebrate, by appropriate ceremonies, the centennial anniversary of this memorable and decisive event, which constituted the 4th day of July, A. D. 1776, the birthday of the nation; and whereas it is deemed fitting that the completion of the first century of our national existence shall be commemorated by an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development, and of its progress in those arts which benefit mankind, in comparison with those of older nations; and whereas no place is so appropriate for such an exhibition as the city in which occurred the event it is designed to commemorate; and whereas as the exhibition should be a national celebration, in which the people of the whole country should participate, it should have the sanction of the Congress of the United States: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures, shall be held, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876.

SEC. 2. That a commission to consist of not more than one delegate from each State, and from each Territory of the United States, whose functions shall continue until the close of the exhibition, shall be constituted, whose duty it shall be to prepare and superintend the execution of a plan for holding the exhibition; and, after conference with the authorities of the city of Philadelphia, to fix upon a suitable site within the corporate limits of the said city, where the exhibition shall be held.

SEC. 3. That said commissioners shall be appointed within one year from the passage of this act, by the President of the United States, on the nomination of the governors of the States and Territories respectively.

SEC. 4. That in the same manner there shall be appointed one commissioner from each State and Territory of the United States, who shall assume the place and perform the duties of such commissioner and commissioners as may be unable to attend the meetings of the commission.

SEC. 5. That the commission shall hold its meetings in the city of Philadelphia, and that a majority of its members shall have full power to make all needful rules for its government.

SEC. 6. That the commission shall report to Congress, at the first session after its appointment, a suitable date for opening and for closing the exhibition; a schedule of appropriate ceremonies for opening or dedicating the same; a plan or plans of the buildings; a complete plan for the reception and classification of articles intended for exhibition; the requisite custom-house regulations for the introduction into this country of the articles from foreign countries intended for exhibition; and such other matters as in their judgment may be important.

SEC. 7. That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

SEC. 8. That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission herein provided for of the proposed exhibition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners, for publication in their respective countries.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, it will be seen that this act was an act to celebrate the centennial anniversary of the birthday of this country, by an international exhibition, where foreign arts, manufactures, and products and our own could be compared. This act was introduced into the Senate from the Committee on Foreign Relations in 1871. It is for an international exposition in its preamble; it is for an international exposition in every section of it. That is declared expressly, in its first section, to be its very object. It does, in conclusion, direct the President of the United States, when certain information in reference to the progress of this matter shall be given him, to make a proclamation and to communicate the time, place, and circumstance of the exhibition to our diplomatic representatives abroad, in order that they shall, in accordance with their duty, communicate it to the governments to which they were respectively accredited. This was the proposition introduced into the Senate of the United States in 1871, and into that proposition was incorporated a proviso that the Government of the United States should not be made liable for any debts incurred by the parties who were to be trusted with the management of this matter. It was to be under the auspices of this Government. The executive head of this Government was to communicate this information of time, place, and circumstance to foreign powers from whose shores we had so recently come. But the United States was not to be liable for the debts of this machine which was to do the work—a proper precaution; a very proper precaution. I have not looked whether that clause was in the bill when it came from the committee or not, nor do I care. It was an exceedingly proper precaution. The credit of the United States was not then to be trusted, without a direct appropriation of money, to any set of men, no matter how much respected in the communities from which they came. We would not permit ourselves to be liable without our own consent, although it was to be done under the national auspices, and we wished it godspeed, and we commended this international exhibition to foreign peoples and foreign governments.

In pursuance of this authority given by the act, the President of the United States having received the information which was the prerequisite to his issuing this proclamation, did issue it. He did proclaim the time, the place, the circumstance, and the manner of this celebration, and a circular was sent, through the State Department, to all our foreign representatives abroad, and they did communicate this to the governments to which they were accredited, and eight, I am informed, of the governments already have cordially accepted the invitation in the same spirit and for the same purposes that we had accepted three invitations to visit their shores when they had such exhibitions.

But, Mr. President, out of an abundant anxiety and precaution, I presume, or from some other motive, no doubt creditable to him, the Secretary of State saw that these letters were being answered as if they had been direct invitations. Whether he had any reason to doubt that the invitations were perfectly understood as they were intended to be, or not, I am uninformed, but out of abundant precaution he did issue another circular, which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] referred to on a previous occasion, in which he cautioned our ministers and diplomatic agents abroad that what he had sent to them previously was not an invitation, but was the President's proclamation in the words of the act of Congress, and sent to them under the order of the act of Congress, and they must go no further with it. Some gentlemen asked in the course of this debate why they had not all ascertained if these invitations were given. That last circular was also communicated to some of these powers, and that little delicate question as to whether that was an invitation, intended to be a cordial invitation or not, or whether it was a notice which amounted to an invitation, (when attention was called to it by our Government issuing another circular,) has undoubtedly made a little hesitation, which it was our duty to relieve one way or the other. It was a little matter of delicacy which any one can see, and of which every one in this body of any faith must be in favor of settling. Every one must be in favor of settling the question of this invitation with that proper courtesy and delicacy which become a great Government like ours, who have so recently sent their commissions at great expense to foreign shores to attend their exhibitions, and who have so recently themselves construed such invitations and replied to them.

So far as the simple matter of courtesy I say, nobody can doubt it that we must relieve the country. For this purpose, and no other purpose, as I understand it, was the bill now before us introduced into the House of Representatives. The proposition in the original bill, you will recollect, was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] was, I think, then the chairman. The proposition, you remember, was for an international exposition, and nothing else. The invitations, such as they were, were sent out in the very words of the act, and this question now arises. They come to Congress, and here is the little question which they present to us: Perhaps we have erred in the very words of invitation, but you must have meant that in your act; but we do not wish to transgress the intention you have. What do you mean by it? Shall we make it an invitation and send it, or do you want it stopped? That was, as I understand it and as I have heard it fully explained before in a committee of which I am a member, the sole object of the introduction of this bill which has led to this debate.

But, Mr. President, it has become perfectly evident since the passage of the original act, from various circumstances which have been recalled in this debate, that something more must be done. One circumstance was the financial crisis that has occurred. Another was, if you choose to put it so, and it is quite possibly so, that those gentlemen of character, and position, and energy, who had undertaken to carry this thing through, with this panic upon them were not receiving money sufficient for this purpose in the way they had hoped. Put it that way if you choose, and now they come here to this Congress, and having accepted the charge of this international exhibition given to them by this body, they tell us of this delicacy about the invitation. They say, "In considering the question of whether you are going to invite these people, to confirm, in other words, the invitation, shall it be ordered so as to send what we have sent or not? We tell you frankly that an element in that consideration is where we are to get the money. We do not want this to be a failure. It shall not be a failure. We mean it shall be a success. We do not know where to get the money. At all events the people do not come forward and give us the money as they would do if they knew that Congress would not help us. Therefore, although you are not liable, in the very words of your act, although Congress is not liable for one single act we do, for one single contract we make, knowing that we cannot make them liable, we come to you and say to you that until you tell us whether you want it to be a great international entertainment or not, whether you mean to approve of these invitations and until you tell us whether you will make a proper appropriation for it, we are afraid to go on." And, Mr. President, with that frankness, that honesty, and that truthfulness of statement in these events which prevented this thing from having even the appearance of a snare or a deception, it was charged upon instantly in this body as an appropriation bill in disguise. On the very first morning when the question was whether it should be brought up or not, when the officer presiding ruled time after time that any discussion of the measure was out of order, Senators in this body on both sides of politics jumped to their feet and insisted upon arguing that it was an appropriation bill in disguise; that it was unconstitutional; that, as a Senator said yesterday, it violated public propriety!

Mr. President, I have said to the very best of my ability, in the fewest words I could, this much about the history of this matter in the opening of the few remarks I have to offer in vindication of the character and action of those gentlemen whose patriotism has made them willing to accept this trust, and who, from their prominence in all virtues, have had this trust forced upon them by their fellow-citizens and by the power to whom you intrusted the selection. Now, sir, while I trust that I shall discuss the few points that seem to me to be necessary to be discussed in this question with the quietness and calmness becoming my position in the Senate, I will say that I felt mortified as an American Senator that the question whether we should make a national or international exhibition of this; and the other question, whether we had gone too far to retract; the question of the proper way to celebrate the Fourth of July; the question of whether we should at this time appropriate money or not for such a purpose, could not be calmly and quietly discussed without having charges made on the gentlemen who have come and told you so frankly and simply their story with an honesty that pertains to them; and that those gentlemen of the Senate who felt it their duty from natural impulses, or from the instruction of their Legislatures at home, or the feeling of their people, to present the matter to you for your judgment, should be forced to listen to the suggestion that an attempt was being made to deceive any man in this body, and they ran with hot haste to prevent even that suspicion.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio who spoke yesterday, [Mr. THURMAN,] whom I regret not to see in his seat now, it is well known occupies a position in the democratic party not excelled by any man on this floor or elsewhere; and if it is not well known it ought to be that there is no gentleman in that party on this floor or elsewhere whom I respect and esteem more, and from whom I so unwillingly differ, particularly on a constitutional point. That Senator comes here full of years and full of experience; he comes here having served in the House of Representatives before his advent here, and comes to us now again for a new term, indorsed by the democracy of Ohio. His position is proud; he has a right to speak, and speak authoritatively; and therefore, when that Senator rose yesterday to speak on this bill, and I was making an effort to obtain the floor, I most cheerfully and readily yielded to him; not from courtesy to him alone, I regret to say, but because I desired, before I opened my mouth on this question in the Senate, to know and hear what were the views of my learned and distinguished friend from Ohio.

I regret to say that the expressions and the constitutional arguments which he brought forward alike failed to convince my mind or affect my judgment. The Senator took three "positions," as he called them, or perhaps four.

The first position was, that as to this celebration and the appropriation of money for it—for he said this motion to refer to the Committee on Appropriations means appropriating money—he was fully convinced that the bill, as proposed to be amended, would be unconstitutional. He said that if it were not unconstitutional he would go, with all his heart, for a national exhibition. He apologized for not expressing with ardor and enthusiasm and devotion his affection for his country and her natal day. He said he would scorn himself if he felt it necessary to parade such feelings as those before the public in his vindication. But it was alone, and he repeated it more than once, on the ground that his constitutional view, his solemn duty as a sworn Senator here, prevented his giving that vote which his heart led him to give, which his heart was urging him to give—it was on that ground alone that he could not support the bill.

Mr. President, I cannot believe that distinguished Senator; that is, I cannot believe that he knew himself when he said he would scorn himself if he could give expression to that love of country and patriotism which ten minutes afterward burst from his glowing lips. I cannot believe that when every gentleman in the Senate, and the whole audience and the American people, heard with pleasure, and gratitude, and approbation, his eloquent and glowing words, he alone, of all the world, was despising himself for his utterances. I respect him too much, and I love him too much, to believe that he is so unfortunate and so little appreciates the love and affection of those who surround him, to think that we believe he scorns himself for one patriotic word he ever uttered in all his good life.

But, Mr. President, what a curious thing it is to see how great men's minds, filled for years past with constitutional constructions and desirous to explain properly and construe it rightly, finally become afflicted with a mania, until they look at every little bill, look where it cannot be found, for concealed violations of its provisions. These gentlemen discover difficulties which exist only in their heated imaginations. O, how I should like to have seen my friend before he made up his mind, so much as he says against his heart, to take the course he has taken on this bill, to have said a few little things to him. He asks "Where do you find the power under the Constitution to vote away the public money for an exhibition, national or international?" Has any Senator pointed him to a clause of the Constitution? Then he assumes that some Senator would point him to the clause concerning the general welfare. He says the clause authorizing Congress to provide for the general welfare is not a substantive clause, and has not been construed so. He says it is a clause dependent upon the power of taxation; that the power of taxation is a substantive clause and is unlimited. And yet the clause attached to it, he says, should have written before it "in order," to make it dependent. Let him have this construction; then there is the unlimited power to tax in order to provide for the general welfare. There is no man stricter in his construction of the Constitution than myself, but I do like to start with that little grain of common sense which it is wise to use in most affairs of life; and I cannot see but that "the general welfare" is within certain limits just such a question as in any court of law would be considered.

What is "the general welfare?" Where is the court to decide what is "the general welfare," when the Constitution has given us an unlimited power to tax for the general welfare? "Well," says a Senator from another State, or perhaps the same Senator, "do you mean to say that that clause is unlimited; that we can do anything we please which we think is for the general welfare?" No; I do not. It is limited by the meaning of the words "general welfare." It is limited, as every other clause in the Constitution dependent and substantive is limited, by the proper construction of the words used and the sense they were used in; and that Senator who, sitting here, will vote away the public money for the general welfare without putting in his heart and exercising his judgment, to ascertain whether by precedent, whether by a proper construction of the words, it is for the general welfare, is simply violating his duty and his oath.

We cannot make words any more definite. The Congress of the United States are made by the Constitution the judges whether a tax levied is for the public welfare. It may possibly in the beginning, as much as anything else, have meant a union of these States in matters of foreign commerce, in matters of protection against Indians and others; and as the range became more vast, it may mean other things; but what that "general welfare" is, and whether taxes are properly levied for that purpose, in order to maintain it, is a question for every Senator's own conscience. Yes, sir, it is a question for the conscience of every Senator, and that is a tribunal from which there is a court of appeal even on earth. There may be no court of appeals from his conscience that violates the construction he adopts; but there is a court of appeal when the House of Representatives come before the people biennially for election, and it is felt in every fiber of this body and the other. Every man who votes on this bill does so knowing that the people are asking us "what we are doing with the public money," and are crying for economy; and that is the constitutional tribunal, that is the conservative feature, that is held over the judgment of Senators and Members when they are called upon to construe the meaning of voting money for the general welfare.

But, Mr. President, I do not take the position, nor do I mean to put myself on the record as taking the position, that this appropriation should be placed among those statutes which are passed for the general welfare. It may be so. It might be that if driven to it I might take that position. But that being the clause in the Constitution to which the Senator from Ohio alluded, as in my humble judgment he failed to show by his argument that it would not authorize what we are doing, I have deemed it proper to reply to him on that clause. But I do esteem that we have the absolute and perfect right, under that portion of the Constitution which gives us power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the States, to establish a building for the purpose of exhibiting the arts and products of other nations in comparison with the arts and products of this country; and if we have not, if we have not stretched the power to regulate commerce away beyond that, if precedent after precedent cannot be produced to show that this is no stretch whatever of power, then I am misinformed, and my reading has been to very little purpose.

If I recollect aright, the Articles of Confederation gave to Congress no power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the States. My impression is that one of our ministers in France communicated to one of the members of the convention forming the Constitution, that one of the most important things to be done was to see to it that the new government had power to regulate commerce with foreign nations; because it was manifest that if each one of these separate sovereignties, which were united together and bound together only by the Articles of Confederation, was unrestrained in reference to carrying on commerce with any foreign nation, starting in a career of rivalry with one another, such places as the ports of New Jersey, Jersey City, and New York, the mouth of the Delaware, and such places as had great openings to the sea, could make for themselves such treaties, such arrangements, such regulations for foreign commerce, as to use it for their own benefit alone, and at the expense of all the other States. As this country became developed, and one State gave territory vast enough to make an empire, which has been since formed into other States, and as the population landing on the sea-shore in our great ports has flown back, and when Chicago and the western cities were made absolutely ports of entry, so that the goods landed at Jersey City are sent in bulk to those cities, the value of this clause has been seen; and it is the West that is protected, and they who have no gates on the sea that are benefited, by the power that we yielded, not for our advantage, to the central Government to control foreign commerce, and it was then inserted, and wisely inserted, that the same control should exist over interstate commerce.

Mr. President, a part of this exhibition is the introduction of goods to be disposed of. It will not be disputed that Congress, which establishes duties, which has levied duties, and taken them off for specific purposes, can take off the duties on goods sent to this exhibition. It will not be disputed that Congress can establish and build bonded warehouses. It will not be disputed, certainly not by the Senators who sit around me, that Congress, under a power as limited in scope as the power to establish a Supreme Court and such inferior jurisdictions as it should find necessary, has gone into the States and into Territories; has bought lands; has put upon them public buildings; has spent millions and millions of dollars, nearly $10,000,000 within the last few years, to erect buildings for district judges to sit in, who are not constitutional judges, but created by Congress. And where is the power in Congress to put up these buildings for court-houses? It rests on the clause authorizing Congress to create jurisdictions inferior to the Supreme Court. There is not one word in the Constitution that tells you that these inferior courts shall be courts with grand juries and petit juries, and crowds of suitors attending them, so that there is no building in a town large enough to hold them, so that in those places you are necessarily driven to put up buildings to hold the courts. The Constitution does not say that you must establish such courts. It is only such inferior jurisdiction—inferior jurisdiction consistent with the Constitution, my friends will say. Where does the power come from which has been exercised always? It comes from that one grain of common sense with which I proposed to start, and which the courts have called in other cases "incidental power."

When a private corporation is chartered by any Legislature in this country, and power is given it to do certain acts, say to make a railroad from one place to another, in section after section proceeds to give it the incidental power to carry out the purposes for which the act was passed, if it did not give those powers, it would have them still just the same. And yet the whole policy of the law has been from the origin of such corporations that everything shall be construed in favor of the grantor and against the grantee, and these incidental powers are construed with the greatest possible strictness; the court never permits anything to be inferred but an absolutely necessary inference; and on that learning the body of the common law is vast. So time necessity has led the strictest constructionists of the Constitution to admit that it was an incidental power to have a building in which you could hold a court if you had authority to have a court there.

Now let us look briefly at other precedents and the course of things in reference to the question I am speaking of. As far back as 1836 an appropriation was passed for an expedition to the South Sea Islands. We all remember that subsequently there was an appropriation made to assist the sufferers by earthquake in Venezuela. There was an appropriation, for which I think some of these objecting Senators voted, to fit out the Polaris to go to the North Pole. We have since then sent three sets of commissioners abroad to world's fairs, to London, to Paris, and Vienna. We have spent, I suppose, on each one of these exhibitions more than half a million of dollars. The two vessels that went to Vienna under the orders of Congress must have cost the Navy Department over $250,000. When those agents whom we had sent to Paris came back, we published in six large and beautiful volumes their reports. Those reports were in such demand that members of Congress were importuned, and all their supply was exhausted. The country to-day is thankful for them; they are exceedingly valuable; and no one regrets that they were published.

Under what power was all this done? Was it the general welfare? Was it commerce? Foreign commerce? Intercourse? Intercourse with foreign nations? Or intercourse between the States? The Supreme Court has construed the commercial clause over and over again, in many cases. They have given it an enlarged and extensive meaning, which I think is dangerous in many cases of private transactions, and which I have combated, to the best of my ability, professionally. Under the construction they have given, it means intercourse with foreign nations. If the act of 1871, introduced by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in its preamble, in every section of it, in its direction to the President of the United States, and in the communication of his proclamation to the ministers abroad, is not directly on the subject of regulating intercourse with foreign nations, I have no means of construing in my mind what was meant by that expression when it was used in the Constitution.

The Senator from Ohio on this floor, in my presence, and opposed by me, feebly as I was able to do it at the time, advocated a bill authorizing the Government of the United States to condemn land in a city of his own State, without the authority of the State, for the purpose of putting a public building on it. Verily, it seems to me in this he strained at a gnat and swallowed a camel. I could not swallow that camel, nor do I think any other democratic Senator swallowed it. But when it was an appropriation for a public building in the State of Ohio, he advocated the doctrine that the United States had a right to condemn land; but with all the patriotism and fervor which he showed yesterday, with all the constraint that he had at being controlled by his strict construction and his devotion to the Union, he could not get over this little gnat, and he said nobody in the Senate had yet pointed out to his enlightened and experienced mind under what clause of the Constitution we, the American people, could celebrate the Fourth of July!

But, Mr. President, I have been led to discuss this constitutional question accidentally from referring to a remark of the Senator from Ohio.

The Senator from Ohio proceeded a little further. He then told you, with a pathos that was equal to his previous eloquence, how he had seen the clerks of the Treasury Department, with tears in their eyes, passing by his windows; his soul was melted with sympathy; and he appealed to us stony-hearted men who were willing to vote away the public money to celebrate the Fourth of July, while certain persons, clerks, were being discharged from the Treasury Department! I am sure that every Senator must have been affected by such an appeal. I did not know until the Senator from Ohio had assumed that position that the object of the Government was to support Treasury clerks. I did not know that we had become an eleemosynary institution. I did not know that places in the Treasury Department were meant for the benefit of individuals, but thought rather that they were employed by the Government to do a certain duty, and when the Government did not need them, hard as their fate might be, they would have to seek employment elsewhere. It also occurred to me while he was speaking, that perhaps if it would cost $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 to carry on this exhibition, these poor clerks, these men and women with tears in their eyes, might find employment in connection with this exposition when nothing else was doing and everything was paralyzed. I have heard of public works being set on foot to relieve the poor in times of panic and distress.

But, Mr. President, remember that the Senator from Ohio had told you, in the most emphatic way, that he would vote for this bill if he did not believe it was unconstitutional; that he was restrained by no other motive. Is that consistent? Did he stop to think whether, as he said, this was not the time to take money out of the Treasury; whether he thought we ought to be more economical; whether he thought it might cost a certain amount of money when the money was needed in other places? That had nothing to do, in my humble judgment, with the constitutionality of the bill; and therefore that argument was inconsistent with the one which he had before advanced. His patriotism might have overcome this difficulty if the constitutional question was out of the way.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio also objected to the international character of this exposition. On the very first occasion when this matter was introduced before the Senate the Senator from Massachusetts, who, as I am informed, was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations when the original bill was presented, also objected to it on account of its international character. The Senator from Nevada who has just taken his seat, yesterday and to-day laughed at the idea of its international character. Gentlemen have talked about our celebrating the Fourth of July in the eyes of foreigners; and my distinguished friend from California read to you a caricature from Martin Chuzzlewit of scenes that were witnessed in New York, where newspapers professed to tell the stories of private families, where the popular prejudices and passions and false sentiments were catered to until they were disgusting. He read you that caricature, and then told you that he did not want these people here at that time, because we were going to have a presidential election in 1876, and what would you do with the princes and potentates of the earth here in the midst of a presidential canvass, in the midst of the passions which would certainly be aroused by it? Gentler, kinder than those who spoke in the same direction, much more thoughtful and delicate in his mind; thoughtful as the children of Noah, he would walk backwards and cover a naked parent. Sir, I am not ashamed of the American people. I am not ashamed of them in comparison with any other people, on the Fourth of July or on any other day; on presidential elections or any other occasions. I do not deny that scenes take place here and in every great city on occasions of excitement which would make Christianity shudder anywhere. That is an unfortunate accompaniment of human nature. It exists everywhere; and until the millennium comes and we have something more than human laws, perfect as they may be, to wipe out such stains and prevent such scenes, we cannot hope to live without them.

But I should not allude to this matter simply to show my sense of what I consider unfortunate remarks in this debate by gentlemen who have preceded me had I not a direct purpose to reach. I may be wrong in regard to the taste of the Senator from California, or the Senator from Ohio, or the Senator from Kentucky. They may understand this matter better than I do. It is not a matter of judgment; it is a matter of impulse. But what I desire to call the attention of the Senate to is the great wrong, the great injustice, that has been done to the advocates of this bill, both in and out of this body, and to the cause of truth and justice, by allowing the debate to run into such a false channel, running there not by any design I know, but running there by one Senator after another taking up and continuing a train of thought that he had just heard before. I think that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] introduced this idea. If he did not, I should be glad to be corrected. I think the gentleman from whose committee the original bill came, every line and word of which you will recollect is international, the gentleman who comes from Massachusetts, was he who originally suggested how incongruous it would be to have this an international exhibition, and who opposed this matter of invitation first, and who has the credit of being the brains which these other distinguished gentlemen have followed.

An international exhibition was provided for by the bill which he reported, and which, as I am informed, passed the Senate nemine contradicente, to which every one of you is committed as far as the honor of the country is concerned, as far as the credit of the nation in getting at it in the proper way is concerned, for you all sat silent and passed the bill. The President of the United States did nothing under the bill but what you told him to do. You admitted that it was international in every line of it, from the preamble down. As soon as the question comes up to direct an invitation to issue, the Senator from Massachusetts suggests that this invitation which called to us the presence of princes, potentates, and powers in such numbers, a formidable procession, is unsuitable to the celebration of our centennial anniversary, such as John Adams thought it was going to be, that it will be a mockery to invite them and a shame to us to have them here. I, of course, do not give his words, but this I gathered to be his idea.

Mr. President, I do wish the Senator from Massachusetts had given me that idea before I became one of the individuals who accepted the invitation when the measure came in from his committee originally. I should have thanked him for it, because I do not like to go back on an invitation given to gentlemen who have invited me, and at whose dinner-table I have enjoyed hospitality at their cost, and then to invite them, and tell them subsequently that they misunderstood it; that we did not mean to invite them, because the gentleman from whom the invitation came had changed his mind! I do not propose to permit myself to be put in such a position, or to assist in putting my country in a position that I would not be put in myself. We have a national character, and not only a national honor, but a national propriety and decency to maintain in our reciprocity with the other nations of the world, and I am not only not ashamed of it, but am honestly proud of it; and the record of ours can compare with that of any other nation on this globe.

I was going to say that the Senator from Massachusetts brings forward a long list of these princes and potentates. I recollect that he called on the Khedive of Egypt, who was to come here, and I think there was the eagle with one head, and the eagle with two heads, and the Gallic eagle, the eagle that swept over Marengo, and the eagle that saw the sun of Austerlitz set. Then there were "the lion and the unicorn fighting for the crown," and all these beasts and birds were to crawl in and take their places. It reminded me very much of the opera comique. They were to take their places representing these sovereigns. It reminded me also of a little geography book I once studied, where I saw a queen, sitting with a crown on her head and a scepter in her hand, and under it was written that little children ought not to want to be kings and queens for they had such a dull time, always sitting with a heavy crown on their heads and a scepter in their hands! That was the argument, nothing else, presented to the Senate of the United States, that under this invitation, asking foreign governments to send exhibitors, (invitations which we had accepted three times, and in response to which we had sent three sets of commissioners, and for which we had appropriated millions of dollars)—when we gave an exposition it should not be international, but be national; because, in the first place, it would cost too much; in the next place, we were not fit to receive, in person, all this royalty, who would be really intruding on us, because we have no palaces. We have no places for them to sit in proper state with their heavy crowns on their heads and their big scepters in their hands! That was the argument; and not one of the Senators has really exposed its flimsy sophistry. It is simply answered by this: It is not true. There has never been any such invitation sent. There has never been any proposition to send such an invitation. There has been no country that ever thought of such an invitation. The act did not authorize it, and that Mr. Fish was more than careful in correcting what might possibly have been a mistake in the invitation is apparent from every paper before us. I do not complain of the Senator from Massachusetts in presenting his own view of the question in the way he did; but I do complain when he presents so strongly and forcibly, by such illustrations, that the Senate of the United States were tumbled into such a trap, particularly when that bill, international in every line, and authorizing the only invitation that ever has been given, or ever was proposed to be given, came from that Senator.

Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy any more time, but there is one word that I will say in conclusion. I ask Senators who have been kind enough to remain in the Chamber during the few remarks which I have been making to listen to me for one moment more. Throwing aside all the nonsense which I may have spoken and which others possibly may have spoken in this debate, I want to say one thing. Here is a proposition from honorable-minded men whom you perhaps have assisted in getting into a strait; but if they are in a strait they are not to blame. To them you have in some measure intrusted the honor and character of your country, for you said it was to be under your auspices. They do not ask you for a dollar, but ask you to advise them what they have to do. If you choose to advise them that you do not want the celebration gone on with, you have the same share in it precisely, and so has every member of this Congress. The only possible injury you can do these gentlemen is that you have wasted a good deal of their time uselessly, and they will be obliged to lose the hope of perhaps credit and reward in the way of thanks from a grateful country, and a large amount has been spent to which they have individually contributed.

The Senator from Kentucky in his opening remarks stated that, although it had been said that his State had instructed him on this question, he was not satisfied that it was so; but he made the further remark that he would not vote for this bill if he was instructed; that he would resign his seat before he would vote for this bill. Well, Mr. President, the Legislature of my State has instructed me, and it has instructed me by a perfectly unanimous vote, and I understand a unanimous vote after every member understood what the question was, not passing nemine contradicente in the ordinary way, but after a thorough understanding. I am told every member of the Legislature of New Jersey is in favor of this proposition. I do not speak of any particular form, but in favor of an appropriation by Congress for this purpose. I stated to you on a previous occasion that that Legislature, which I regret to say is republican at the present moment in its party politics, has voted a considerable appropriation for a little State like ours, more money than our share, dividing it proportionately among the States, by twenty or thirty thousand dollars. They have made that in the lower house, since this debate has been in progress, by an amendment, payable only on condition of either an appropriation by Congress or success being assured. There is a condition by which it is lost if this work does not in a brief period go on. Being so instructed, if I did not agree with my constituents—and this was not a party question—I should hesitate, believing that there was no constitutional question involved, not to obey their wishes. Even where I had doubts on a small constitutional point which I could not solve, and the Legislature of my State, with perfect unanimity, understanding what they were doing, told me that they wished me to vote for an appropriation to enable them to celebrate the Fourth of July, 1876, in Independence Hall, I would vote so. I would not take a scruple or a grain of doubt that I had in reference to the construction of a clause which has been construed by abler, wiser, and better men than myself, otherwise, against the unanimous opinion and vote of all parties in my own Legislature. I can see and respect the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky; that is, I might be placed in such circumstances that I would rather resign than obey instructions. If the question of the public security, or the right of private property, or a question that involved the great principles of the nation on which I was very decided in my views, were involved, and I should be instructed by a party that had come into power behind me in the Legislature, of course I should pay no attention to them; but if instructed by my own party, I should then feel it my duty to resign or to obey them, or to solve for myself at that moment the difficult question how far instructions should control my action here.

You will recollect that the Senator from Ohio said he would have scorned himself if he had been enthusiastic on this subject, and yet he is a kind and generous man, and he has reflected upon the faults and foibles of youth. If, coming from where I do, under these circumstances I should run back for one single moment to some reminiscences recalled to me in this debate, and particularly recalled to me by the Senator himself, perhaps the other Senators will excuse me, as well as the Senator from Ohio.

Two or three Senators have alluded to the death of Jefferson and the death of John Adams. The Senator from Massachusetts, with that learning and erudition which shed light upon all questions, and particularly questions like this, has told us the anecdote in reference to the letter of John Adams; and the Senator from Ohio only yesterday told us how the words put by Daniel Webster, on the occasion of his oration in eulogy of Adams and Jefferson, into the mouth of John Adams, were not Webster's words, but were words simply altered for the occasion or paraphrased, written on that day by John Adams in privacy to his wife:

> Through the thick gloom of the present I see the brightness of the future as the sun in heaven. We shall make this a glorious and immortal day. When we are in our graves our children will honor it. They will celebrate it with bonfires and illuminations, with tears, gushing tears, not of slavery and distress, not of agony, but grateful, thankful tears of joy.

On the centennial celebration of the result of the prediction of what that day did bring forth, we still recall that on the fiftieth anniversary of that day Adams died in the middle of the commemoration and while the bonfires and illuminations were still lighted, and there were tears, copious, gushing tears—not of joy, for there the prophecy failed—and Jefferson on the same day and hour was numbered with the dead, and so the eulogist said. So that day shall be honored. Illustrious prophet and patriot, so that day shall be honored. And as oft as it returns thy renown shall come along with it, and the glory of thy life, like the day of thy death, shall never fade from the memory of men.

And, sir, the people of the little State where the battle of Princeton was fought, and the little spot which is my home on the other side of the Delaware, within sight of where Washington crossed, in the dark and trying days of December, the plains of Monmouth, where one of our own maidens, like the Maid of Saragossa, when her chief was slain, shed no ill-timed tear, but filled his fatal post, cannot forget that they too shared in the glories of Independence Hall. They will not forget that this is the time, that Independence Hall is the place, and that the international exhibition in which we have embarked is the manner of the celebration; and they are willing to put their hands in their pockets and sacrifice all their little earnings, and set an example of doing it, in order that the rest of the nation may feel the same.

One other thing, Mr. President, and I am done. Sad scenes have passed since then. We have had to number many a name with the storied names we nurtured in our earlier time. We have had in the last few years many a dissevered family, many a broken heart, North and South. Many comrades have been slaughtered whom I care not to recall in these halls. Younger and sister States, the Western States, whose people have gone out and settled from the Old Thirteen, may remember that it is not wise for strength and manhood to trample on the parent that cherished their infancy; they may remember that we of the Old Thirteen, holding still the gates that lead to the control of foreign commerce, and bring vessels to these shores freighted for their good as well as ours, ask very little when they ask that they will come to Independence Hall and help us recall with them the memories of the past. It will be a bond that will seal up many a trouble that may be brewing between the East and the West; it will be a bridge that will bridge that chasm of which politicians have spoken for six or eight years; it will be a bridge that will cover that chasm into which I do not wish to look.

> On the rice-fields of fair Carolina,
> The head of the matron is bowed;
> The sire takes down his old match-lock,
> And back the old memories crowd.
> He thinks of the glory of Sumter,
> The valor of Marion's men,
> And his heart leaps the gulf in an instant,
> That yawns 'twixt the now and the then.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the question was properly stated by my friend from New Jersey, in saying that the Congress of the United States are called upon now to decide whether or not this proposed celebration of the centennial anniversary of the birth of the Government of the United States shall be a success or a failure. It is best, perhaps, to get rid of one of the most unpleasant features in the discussion which has been had, that there was a want of good faith in the origination of this measure; that the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, which was introduced by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and which, after providing distinctly for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, by holding an international exhibition, the purposes of which were clearly avowed in the preamble of the bill and appeared in every feature of its contents, should not be held at the expense of the United States; that is to say, by the seventh section it was provided—

> That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided for by this act from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expense attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

I do not doubt that there was a great deal of sanguine feeling at that time in the minds of those who favored the celebration, and that they did honestly believe that voluntary subscriptions would be made throughout the United States to the capital stock which was authorized by the act June 1, 1872, so that the United States Government would not be called upon to contribute to the expense of this matter. I have no question that such was their hope and such was their belief. And it is also perfectly plain to me that it was not a reasonable hope or belief even at that time; and the sequel has proved abundantly that it was vain. The crash that took place last fall in the money markets of this country has made it for the present almost impossible to procure subscriptions for this or any other purpose. There is, no doubt, a distress throughout the country but little anticipated at the time this ball was set in motion. I think, therefore, that now, when a subsequent Congress has the question presented to it whether, because of the pecuniary failure of the enterprise so far as the voluntary subscriptions in the several States is concerned, it is to fail or not, I consider that there is no ground for imputation of any kind against the very worthy and honorable citizens who have been selected as commissioners and whose report has been made to the Senate, or from anything which has been done or suggested by the friends of the measure in the original debate in 1871, or during the present debate.

Let us, so far as the legislation by Congress and acts committed under their authority are concerned, glance at that for one moment. In 1871, on the 3d of March, was approved—

An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876.

That was followed by a second act, approved 1st of June, 1872, of incorporation, reciting this act, and proceeding "to provide for carrying out the objects of the said international exhibition and memorial celebration under the direction of the commissioners of the United States."

The act of June, 1872, provided also that a centennial board of finance should have authority to issue bonds not in excess of the capital stock, and to secure payment of the same by mortgage on its property and prospective income; and made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, as soon as practicable, to prepare and issue such bonds and certificates of stock.

Then followed, on the 3d day of July, 1873, the proclamation of the President of the United States, reciting the two acts of Congress to which I have referred, and addressed to all nations who might be pleased to take part in the celebration. That was succeeded by the publication of a note by the Secretary of State to foreign ministers, drawing the exhibition to their notice and inviting them to take part therein.

Then followed the publication of general regulations in accordance with the law, by which the whole scheme was formulated, so that exhibitors and visitors should understand what they had to do in order to participate properly in this exhibition. After that we have publications of acceptance on the part of those who have been so invited; I mean foreigners. I think it has been stated, no doubt correctly, here, that eight of the foreign powers have signified their formal acceptance of the invitation.

In the fall of 1873 the report of the board of commissioners was made to the President of the United States, in accordance with the provision of the original act; and which we have now before us, in an elaborate and well-stated form, of what had been accomplished and of what was proposed to be done, of the estimated cost, and of all those other matters which they were instructed by the act incorporating them, and in pursuance of the letter and spirit of the act of Congress and the proclamations of the President, and the regulations established for carrying into effect the whole scheme of the exhibition. It therefore stands before Congress ready to be executed; and the simple question is, shall it fail for want of money appropriated by the Congress of the United States? I say nothing in regard to having gone too far, or not far enough; but it is perfectly plain that here have been large expenses, and elaborate, well-arranged machinery for the purpose of holding this exhibition in accordance with the act of Congress, which is liable to fail if the motive-power of money be withdrawn from it or be not bestowed.

Now, Mr. President, there is no doubt about one fact, that with the assent of every member of the Senate the act of incorporation was passed declaring that such a commemoration of the birthday of the nation, by holding an international exhibition, should take place. The record of the debates and the journals of this body will disclose the fact that it passed with no voice in opposition, whether that of my honorable friends from Ohio and Kentucky or any one else. It was passed without a division, and no objection appears on the record to it.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator surely does not intend to misrepresent me. The record does not show who voted "yea" and who voted "nay," for the yeas and nays were not called, and there was no division when the vote was taken; but the record does not show that every Senator voted for it, and I for one repeat what I said yesterday, that I voted against that and against the previous bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not hear the honorable Senator say that he voted against the act of March 3, 1871. If he said so, I certainly should not have suggested anything to the contrary of his statement. No man accepts his statements with more perfect confidence than I. I merely repeat, that the bill was passed without a division, and that no vote is recorded against it. If the Senator had opposed the measure, he could have recorded his dissent. I do not know what were his remarks in private to other persons; but I speak by the record when I say that the bill was passed without a division and without any debate to disclose an opposing sentiment.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt my friend just there?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. Unless my recollection fails me entirely, the reason why the bill passed as it did was precisely because it contained, as a fundamental condition, that the United States should not be called upon to pay anything. That was the reason. The bill was subject to that condition; that was an essential part of it; and Senators were comparatively indifferent, therefore, to the character of the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is in error in saying the bill was passed sub conditione. The bill contained a section which I have read at length. There was no condition upon which the bill was passed, except that which appears upon its face. I have read to the Senate, in the hearing of the Senator, the provision of the bill on the subject of expense. Whatever may have been the private understanding of Senators I know not; but I speak of that which appears by the record, which would appear in any court of justice if the case was between individuals. There stands the bill, passed without objection, or a single recorded vote against it. What were the motives of Senators in withholding their opposition, what were their suppositions on the subject, I do not know; but I think the honorable Senator is in error when he states that this bill was passed subject to any conditions other than its own express provisions.

But, Mr. President, the reasons or motives of men are not in question now. I have no doubt that the motives were honorable, and if they were not expressed, it was for reasons good and sufficient to the parties who withheld them. But it was understood after the bill was passed that the celebration was to take place, and that Philadelphia was to be the site. There was, then, to be a centennial memorial of something that had occurred one hundred years ago, the declaration of the independence of the thirteen Colonies, and the causes for it set forth in the immortal paper that was drawn up by the hand of that illustrious Virginian, Thomas Jefferson, and it was the date of that declaration which we intended to commemorate. I believed then, and believe now, that it is very important for the welfare of this country that we should revive the memories and practice among our people of the principles, the feelings, and the sentiments that led to that declaration and the events that followed it. We need it for those of us whose ancestors were living in this country at that day, who have in our veins the blood that flowed in the veins of the men who took part in those proceedings, and we need it for that large body of our adopted fellow-citizens who have since come here to incorporate themselves with this country, and who form so large, so honorable, so valuable and respected a portion of our fellow-countrymen.

It so happened that the city of Philadelphia, being at the time the chief city in the thirteen Colonies, was the place of meeting of the Continental Congress, and it was there that the lives, the fortunes, and the sacred honor of the representatives of the United States were solemnly and grandly pledged to make the United Colonies free and independent States. The Hall in which this paper was signed stands there to-day; and the bell that on that day tolled out liberty to the earth and to the inhabitants thereof is there still, although its iron voice is as silent as those of the men who heard its tones on July 4, 1776. Historical memories cluster thickly around Philadelphia, and the most noted battle-fields and scenes of the Revolution lie close at her doors. Valley Forge and Germantown, Monmouth and Trenton, Brandywine and Red Bank, are all in close circle around her.

I said in 1871, and I repeat to-day, that Independence Hall, in the city of Philadelphia, was the true birthplace of American Independence; and when we mean to celebrate its anniversary, whether it be annually or centennially, it is just as proper to seek the city of Philadelphia, where that Hall is, as it would be to celebrate the birthday of Shakespeare, at Stratford-upon-Avon. It is fortunate, too, that one of the finest sites imaginable, of almost unsurpassed beauty and convenience, lies upon the river Schuylkill, in the grand park of more than three thousand acres which belongs to the city of Philadelphia, and which has been dedicated to the use of this celebration and the accompanying international exhibition during their continuance.

There is no question that large obligations and responsibility rest upon the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania to make this celebration in all respects worthy of the vast concourse that will assemble at the time indicated. Whether they will properly meet them I cannot say. I have felt, however, in reading the names of the citizens of that city and State who have connected themselves with the enterprise, that there is no reason to doubt that skill and diligence and science and integrity will all be contributed to make the celebration worthy. The future must decide how well they have performed the duties which have been imposed upon them, in great part upon their own solicitation and instance. They have sought this honor and they must answer for their manner of performing the duties that have accrued under it.

Mr. President, it is proposed that this shall be a national celebration. It could be nothing else if we mean to celebrate the birthday of our Government. No State could do it. All the States must do it, or it would fail in the one necessary quality of nationality. Then it is proposed to revive the spirit of 1776, and what that was, and what wrongs that spirit was meant to resist, plainly appear in the Declaration of Independence, which men seem to me so often to forget, even while the name of liberty sits lightly on their lips. It was to secure certain "inalienable rights" that "governments" were declared to be "instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed"—a golden sentence that should never be forgotten by any ruler, and that should be recalled to those who govern to-day in this country. This fundamental doctrine needs restoration in the minds of the American people. It has been sadly forgotten of late. The curtain did rise upon a ghastly and terrible scene of "States dissevered, discordant, belligerent," which so appalled the prophetic eye of Daniel Webster. No one can to-day look with a brother's eye, the eye of a fellow-countryman, upon the condition of the Southern States without longing to give them relief. When this celebration shall come, as come I hope it may, I want to see the men of the North meet the men of the South with the same hearty clasp of good-will and brotherhood as their forefathers gave and received, and when independence is rejoiced over to remember the part that the South played in the war of the first Revolution in securing it for the North as well as for themselves. South Carolina, overrun by military power, trodden under foot by utterly overwhelming forces of the British government and by tories in her midst—let her be remembered as the State of Marion, of Sumter, of Pickens, of Rutledge, and of Laurens; and let us remember those men as keeping alive for us the lamp of liberty amid suffering and in poverty, until their stubborn courage won for them and for us the independence so sought for.

We have heard and seen of late so much of the war powers of the Constitution that I must confess I long to see some exhibition of the peace powers of the Constitution. I have always believed that the best hopes of the country lay in mutual good understanding between the people of its various sections. With good-will once more established, the occupation of that class in our midst who live upon the spoils that ever attend confusion and strife, and find their power and enjoyment in ill-will and misunderstandings between their fellow-countrymen, will have passed away; and this, I confess, is my chief reason for supporting this national celebration. But for this, and but for these hopes, I should be lukewarm and I should be disposed to consider even more closely the question of economy and to yield to any possible doubts I might have as to the constitutionality of this measure, and which might prevent me from giving my vote in its favor.

But there is much to be done by those who have the control of this Government to prepare for this celebration. I speak not merely of providing the necessary pecuniary means; I speak of placing this country in such a condition that it shall not be bitter irony to talk of liberty, of freedom, of equality among the States, of brotherhood among our people, when such facts as now exist and stare us in the face deny the existence of any or of all these things in a large portion of our country. Sir, when that day comes to be celebrated, political disabilities imposed in the heat of war and in the fervor of revolutionary periods must all have disappeared; test oaths excluding men from their just share in government must be wiped out; the voice of denunciation and proscription in relation to past differences must be silenced. Unless injustice shall have given way to justice, unless local self-government shall be freed from Federal overthrow, and peace and good-will reign in the American heart, in vain will architecture raise your lofty dome, and ingenuity and skill fill your halls with the products of your own and the industry of other nations; in vain will be acts of Congress, proclamations of the President, or glowing orations. All these will be of as little worth as the pronunciamientos of Mexican governments invoking the names of God and Liberty, an insult to one and a mere mockery of the other.

Mr. President, objections to this measure on the ground of alleged unconstitutionality have been made, and coming from the sources they do lead me to their most respectful consideration. I am so accustomed to doubt the correctness of my own views of matters of this nature when I find them opposed to those of my honorable friends, the Senators from Kentucky and Ohio, usually so sound as jurists, and always so unimpeachable as patriots, that their unhesitating and almost passionate denunciations of this measure have caused me to bestow upon it very careful consideration.

The question of our constitutional power to pass this bill is far graver to me than that of the mere expense involved, although I am not unmindful of the duty at all times, and especially in a period so full of pecuniary distress as the present, to insist upon a sound and careful economy in our disposition of public money. If the money is to be spent, it will be in giving employment, now so much needed, to our own citizens, and for an object which can scarcely fail to return ultimately, if not speedily, large benefits to the entire country. In a commercial point of view, which is far from being the highest in which this undertaking is to be considered, the proposition that our present expenditure shall result in large incidental and ultimate profit seems to me entirely reasonable.

The objection of a want of constitutional power is not affected, however, by amounts. If it can be maintained, it is as fatal to the smallest appropriation of money as to the largest. The principle must control both equally, or it cannot be said to exist. And here let me say I cannot quite understand the reasoning of gentlemen who conceded that such a celebration and international exhibition could be properly held under the auspices of the Federal Government, and yet no expense whatever should accrue to the Government.

Since the time the Israelites complained that they could not produce bricks without straw, it has been admitted that just means should be provided for every proposed end, and the very assumption of control by the Government of the United States over this celebration and exhibition implied the employment of its agents to do the work, and, as a consequence, payment in money for their services.

If an officer of the Army or Navy be detailed to act in co-operation with the promoters of this work—his official pay continuing—it is, in substance, an appropriation of just that amount from the Treasury in aid of the work. Also, if a national ship be employed in transportation of individuals or property in aid of such a work, it is substantially an appropriation of money, equal in amount to the value of such transportation.

In the very nature of things, the very undertaking to supervise and control such work by the Government involved some expense to the Government; it would be impossible to avoid it.

We have been asked to refer to that clause of the Constitution under which the power of Congress to appropriate money for a national celebration and international exhibition can be justified.

Let us first consider the question of national celebration.

If the nature of the object be national, as distinguished from local or sectional; if its performance invade no reserved rights of any State, or of the people; if it does not transgress any limitation as to extent of power or mode of execution enumerated in other clauses of the Constitution or its amendments; if, finally, the object be not only innocent, but manifestly conducive to "the general welfare of the United States;" if it be in harmony with the system of co-ordinate national and State control, surely it is an unreasonable, unwarranted, and dangerous rule of construction that will deny to these plain, yet pregnant and important, words all meaning whatsoever, and undertake to read the Constitution as though they were wholly omitted, and (to use the language of Story) "as entirely senseless, or inexpressive of any intention whatsoever."

I cannot consent to such doctrine, to attain which interpretation a change of punctuation from that of the official copy, and the interpolation of the words "in order to," are both resorted to.

Mr. President, every word of the Constitution is entitled to its relative weight; and, as Hamilton stated in No. 40 of the Federalist, "every part of the expression ought if possible to be allowed some meaning, and be made to conspire to some common end."

I have stated that provision for "the general welfare" finds expression twice in the Constitution. The preamble declares that to "provide for the general welfare" was one of the objects of creating the Government; and when the Constitution has passed through the careful hands, the close, unflinching criticism of its authors, and is given to us for our guidance, we find in the very front of the powers delegated to Congress, power to "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

If these words had stood alone; if the Constitution had not been arranged upon the scheme of a distribution of powers in the various departments of Government, and recognized the all-important reservation of power in the several States; if, in other words, limitation and distribution of powers, checks, and balances had not been the very nature and basis of our system, the words would have implied an unlimited authority, but because the language is to be construed in connection with all that follows and precedes it in the Constitution, is it to be deprived of all force and meaning; is it a vague and glittering generality, which Senators may in their discretion omit in reading, and treat with total disrespect in framing laws?

I cannot consent to any such doctrine. None could seem more unjust or dangerous than that plain words should be stripped of all natural meaning, and denied all effect, even when they are sensibly expressed in the place where they are found.

No, sir; the words do contain a grant of power, and impose the duty of its execution—not an unlimited, distinct, independent power; but, like all other grants in the Constitution, a qualified power, checked and balanced by other provisions, together with which it is to be construed.

And if the exercise of the power be in the direct line of the authority so conferred, if the intent and consequence of the act be germane to the grant of authority to perform it; if it be an act that no State is competent to perform, and an act transgressing no limitation elsewhere imposed by the Constitution, and invading no reserved right, then, under this grant of power to provide for the common defense and general welfare, warrant may be found for legislative action.

The Senator from Ohio told us yesterday that the language of the Constitution referred to was no longer construed by any lawyer to be a grant of substantive power. But I will read his language:

> I need not say to every lawyer in the Senate that these words, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," are not construed now by any lawyer anywhere to be a distinct and substantive grant of power.

In other words, he asserts the doctrine that these plain words in the Constitution are an idle prelude, in some indefinite way descriptive of the enumeration of powers that follow in the same section, and that of themselves they are totally without force and weight.

Mr. President, no form of words in the Constitution was the subject of more criticism in the debates which led to the formation of that instrument than this first and most important delegation of power to Congress.

The first resolution adopted by the convention on this subject was:

> That the national Legislature ought to be empowered to enjoy the legislative rights vested in Congress by the Confederation, and, moreover, to legislate in all cases to which the separate States are incompetent, or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation.

The latter clause was subsequently altered, so as to read:

> And, moreover, to legislate in all cases for the general interests of the Union, and also in those to which the States separately are incompetent, and in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation.

And the first draught of the Constitution was prepared in pursuance of these resolutions.

The journal of the convention shows the history of the long and careful examination of the subject until the final draught of the whole clause was adopted as it now stands:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

The language was brought forward and adopted in connection with the power of taxation, which was to be limited to the payment of the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare; and these last words were found in the Articles of Confederation and reproduced, as I have said, in the preamble of the Constitution, and inserted with full knowledge of their force and meaning in the text of the Constitution itself "in order" to grant a power of taxation co-extensive with all constitutional objects.

The historical examination of this subject is interesting and important; and the opinions of Mr. Jefferson, who was not, however, a member of the Constitutional Convention, and of Mr. Madison, (in his letter of 1830 to Mr. Stevenson, of Virginia,) and the commentaries of Judge Story, are, of course, familiar to those who have examined the subject, and differences of opinion have always existed; and many and distinguished names, among them Washington, Monroe, Hamilton, and Wilson, are arrayed in opposition to the views of Mr. Madison; one side insisting that to give the words in question the construction of an independent and substantive grant of power would practically create an unlimited national Government, and the other insisting that no unqualified power is to be inferred; but, properly construed, its limitation will prevent the accomplishment of any other than strictly national purposes, without the infraction of any of the other limitations of the Constitution, the reserved rights of the States or of the people.

But I do not propose, at this time, to enter further into this ancient and ever-important question which has called forth so many and varied opinions—one that cannot be subjected to definite classification—and in the application of the proper construction of which each case must be considered on the basis of its own facts, tendencies, and results.

I need scarcely say here to those who have taken the trouble to note my course in legislation that I am a strict constructionist of powers under the Constitution. I believe that ours is a Government only of special and enumerated powers, and not of general or unlimited powers; but I am unwilling to say that language which has been placed so carefully, not simply in the preamble of the Constitution but carried affirmatively a second time into the very enumeration of the powers delegated to Congress, was placed there so that it was intended to have no effect and to be mere idle words which can at will be left out of consideration. In construing the Constitution of the United States it is our duty to construe each part with relation to all. We are not at liberty to take one part and construe it without reference to others. I do not believe that this grant of power to the Congress of the United States was a mere empty prelude to the enumeration of other powers; but I believe that it did contain some grant of power qualified by the subsequent enumeration of powers, and the provisions of the Constitution, and the scheme of the entire form of government which was sought to be created.

There is no question here as to the source from which this money is derived. That does not arise. The only question is as to the appropriation of the money. Taxation brought it into the Treasury. We are not questioning the source, but the doubt is as to the power of appropriation; to appropriate public moneys for a celebration of the commemoration of the nation's birthday, and combined with that an international exhibition of the world's material progress in art, science, and manufactures. Can it be doubted that the object of this bill is a national object—not sectional, not local, but national? It is so in its nature; it is so in the description which the law has given it. In the first place, there is in this grant of power a restriction that the matter shall relate to the general welfare, so that general benefit to the entire Union should be reached; not a mere local or sectional benefit; secondly, that no grant of power expressly made should by force of these words be enlarged by implication. That is the most familiar, and, in my opinion, the safest principle of construction of the Constitution—expressum facit, cessare tacitum—that in construing a grant of express power in the Constitution you cannot ingraft upon that an implied power. There are incidents to powers, necessary incidents, which become as much a part of the power as the original grant, and upon that doctrine has proceeded our legislation since the question first came before our courts; but nowhere is it said that you are to seek to ingraft by implication another power where you already have an express grant in relation to the same subject.

The reserved rights of the States in the control of their domestic and internal affairs cannot be impaired by Congress under the grants of power to it. The "common defense" and "general welfare" are phrases to be construed with reference to the condition of our Government, and the scheme of its operation. You cannot, under the pretext of legislating for the public welfare, do anything that would destroy the autonomy of a State or deprive it of its just weight and place in our Federal system.

But there is a class of self-protecting, self-sustaining powers which are inherent, necessarily inherent in every form of government, arising from the very nature of things, which should be exercised under the general designation of power to tax, "in order" to provide for the general welfare. This subject was more considered, more debated in the convention which framed the Constitution, than almost any other. We are not left in doubt as to what was neglected or what was cared for. These words and this provision were made the subject of very close criticism, and of frequent alteration, to which I have already adverted.

The power of taxation is unlimited by the words and forms of the grant; but the nature of the Government, its Federal design and structure, have been held to limit the power of the United States. One illustration of this is that no instrumentality of a State government can be taxed under Federal laws. We have lately renewed the valuable affirmations of that most essential principle. The Supreme Court of the United States, within the last two years, and in more than one case, has decided that the instrumentalities of the States cannot be taxed by the Congress of the United States; and so a general income tax laid by Congress, under which law taxes had been collected on the judicial salaries in the several States, and upon the salaries of other State officers, was declared to be invalid, and the money was refunded from the Treasury of the United States. So, also, in respect to the tax upon State process in the courts, it has been declared to be invalid; and therefore the doctrine is recognized that it is just as essential to the States that their autonomy should be preserved from the invasion of Congress, under the pretext of taxation, as it is that the powers of the Government of the United States should be preserved from State taxation or interference.

The Constitution is to be construed as a whole, and every part with reference to every other part, and every question of power is referable to the nature and condition and structure of the scheme of government which was designed to be created by it. The Government is a Federal Government in its nature; it is composed of States whose existence is the essential basis of the Government. These State governments retain what Chief Justice Marshall calls the vast mass of powers necessary for their domestic and internal control; but to the General Government were committed powers essential for the general welfare of the United States. Either in the State governments or in the Government of the United States all governmental power necessary to sustain governments must be found; and in determining under which authority the proposed power is to be properly exercised, we must first ask what is the nature of the object to be accomplished. If it be local in its extent and usage, the State alone should exercise it. If it is palpably beyond the function of the State, and the power of the State is incompetent to exercise the power, it may fall—and it almost necessarily must fall—under Federal cognizance. Thus there are many public acts of Congress which have found warrant under the "general-welfare" and "common-defense" clause, and this has been the history and practice of our Government from its foundation, as I shall presently endeavor to show; and it would be difficult—nay, not only difficult, but almost impossible—to classify them under the express grants of power in the Constitution which are enumerated in the same section which has given Congress the power to provide for common defense and the general welfare. Therefore, when cases come before us, each must be weighed and considered in all its points of view, and then decided on upon its merits.

The present case before the Senate proposes an expenditure in celebration of the centennial anniversary of the nation's birthday. It proposes to put a milestone in the pathway of our journey as a people. From its very nature this cannot be accomplished by a State. It invades no State without her consent. It assumes no jurisdiction by the Federal Government over a State. It takes no private property, with or without compensation, in that State for public use. It limits no State power. It interferes with no man's individual liberty. It simply makes provision in money for an exhibition of national joy at national expense. It is a mere money appropriation. It cannot certainly be considered a dangerous exercise of power in its very nature, even supposing it were unwarranted by the charter; but it seems to me not unreasonable to say that it is warranted by the very fact of the United States Government being a government. If the contrary of this be true, then the cost of every Fourth of July salute from every Government vessel, every fortress, every arsenal, from every camp, that has been fired from 1776 until the present day—all these have been without warrant of law. And yet it has been the invariable practice, warranted by the opinion, by the judgment, of every man who was ever connected with the Government, that this thing should be done. Now, it will not do to say that powder is a cheap thing; that salutes cost but little. That is not the question. If they cost Government money, and if you appropriate money, no matter how small the sum, for the purpose of celebration, even to that extent, then you are upon principle estopped from denying that it becomes a mere matter of discretion how much larger your appropriations shall be in the same direction.

And let us also consider the international feature which it is proposed to strike out. I propose to consider the constitutional aspect first. The power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the different States is expressly conferred, and is among the enumeration of the powers that follow in the same article which confides to Congress power to provide for the common defense and general welfare, and to pass laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers. How has that power been exercised since its very origin? It has been exercised in such a variety of ways that to build a house, whether of wood, stone, or glass, for the purpose of commercial exhibition, inviting comparison from foreign nations of what they have produced with what our own people have produced, is far closer and far more immediately under the natural exercise of the power granted by the words of the Constitution than whole classes of acts which our Government from its very creation has undertaken. We have sent expeditions of humanity, expeditions in the cause of science, pure and simple, with but little regard to commerce; we have sent expeditions designed to pave the way for future transactions of commerce into all seas and at all times in our nation's history. We have sent them to the North Pole, and, if I mistake not, my honorable friend from Ohio was one of the champions for the expedition of Captain Hall.

Mr. THURMAN. There again my good friend is entirely mistaken. I voted dead and square against it.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I am mistaken as to that. I only know that the expedition of Captain Hall had money appropriated for it, and I had the impression that the Senator from Ohio favored it. It seems that I was mistaken in that. We have had explorations, under Government expense, of the Dead Sea. We have had expeditions to Japan. We have had them to South America; notably among them that of Herndon and Gibbon in exploring the waters of the Amazon and its tributaries. All these were made without this objection being urged that they were not fairly within the power of Congress. In short, from the very commencement of our Government we have had, under what is termed the commercial clause, a series of expeditions tending to the interests of commerce, and the appropriations have been passed with but little objection on the ground of unconstitutionality. Since 1850, three several European exhibitions have been held. We have appropriated money to send our commissioners to England, to France, and to Austria. We paid them salaries. We published their reports. Under what clause of the Constitution was this done? I do not know whether my two honorable friends from Kentucky and Ohio approved of any or all of these things, or whether they disapproved of them; but I merely cite to them what has been the practice of the Government in this respect, which was supposed to find its warrant under the commercial clause of the Constitution.

Now, it is palpable that an exhibition such as is proposed, with an international feature, by building a warehouse in the city of New York, or Philadelphia, or anywhere else, for the benefit of the entire country, that we may have the opportunity of inspection of the works of science, art, and industry of other countries, is certainly more closely and naturally connected with the exercise of the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and between the States, than any of the acts to which I have referred.

But there has been another large class of acts of charity. The very voice of humanity has been recognized and obeyed by the Congress of the United States by pecuniary appropriations. Here was a bill introduced in Congress in 1847 to relieve the famine in Scotland and in Ireland. On the 27th of February the bill was moved by a Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Crittenden) to be taken from the table. Mr. Webster expressed his approval of the object of the bill. Mr. Crittenden moved an amendment of the phraseology, not altering the intent and object of the bill. Mr. Calhoun, of South Carolina, also debated the subject, and in the course of his remarks I find that he not only approved of the appropriation of money for the relief of the starving people in Ireland and Scotland, but, as I read from the record of the debate, he "suggested that, as there was suffering also in France, a vessel should be sent to Great Britain and to France to carry the bounty of this country," and was understood to say that no constitutional difficulty interposed to prevent it. The bill was finally passed by a vote of 27 to 13, with the remark from Mr. Calhoun, which I have stated, approving of the measure and proposing to extend such acts, and declaring that there was no constitutional difficul'y whatever.

Mr. THURMAN. How about its history in the House?

Mr. BAYARD. I am speaking of the vote in the Senate, and have not its history in the House.

We had another case. In 1856 one of the most graceful and kindly acts of courtesy known to our history was performed by the Government of the United States under the authority of Congress. The British bark Resolute, which had formed, I believe, part of the expedition of Sir John Franklin, was abandoned in the ice near Greenland. She was found by some New England fishermen and brought to this country; and it was proposed that the Government should pay the expenses of the salvage, refit the vessel, and send her back to Great Britain, as an act of national courtesy, to promote good feeling between two great nations—as something not to be estimated in money. It was done; and Mr. Mason, of Virginia, offered a resolution appropriating $40,000, or so much as might be needed, for the purchase of the ship. He reported the resolution himself favorably, and it was passed unanimously.

There has been also a course of commemoration by the Government of the United States, since the foundation of the Government, by striking medals commemorative of notable events in our history. I have not by me a list of those medals, but I have examined it in other days, designing to make myself the owner of a set, as a historical commemoration of American virtue and valor. A medal is an expensive thing; it is a work of art, requiring skill and no little expense for its production. The battle on Lake Erie had a medal. I remember the medal struck in honor of the lingering survivors of those who had signed the Declaration of Independence. This was one of the earliest recollections of my childhood. Under what clause of the Constitution, let me ask, do you find authority for that? It was an act of national commemoration and celebration. It cost money, but a few thousand dollars perhaps; but it was the principle recognized and never denied—the power of the Government of the United States to commemorate acts deemed worthy of national celebration. It was patriotic; it interfered with no man's liberty, nor with the power of any State; and in those respects it is precisely in keeping with the present bill and its objects.

Sir, we have erected statues. Where is the authority for that? Where is the express grant of power to embellish the public buildings of your Government? The clause that Congress shall have exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia will certainly not include that. Exclusive legislation does not mean unlimited or unconstitutional legislation. It means that the Congress of the United States may, subject to the Constitution, do in the District of Columbia what the government of a State can do within its limits. It does not create an absolute government in the District, but exclusive power to legislate under the Constitution.

So, Mr. President, we have had from the commencement of our Government this continual current, nay, this torrent of precedents, approved by statesmen contemporaneous with the earlier and better days of the Constitution, whose respect and jealous care for it never were doubted, who were strict constructionists, who assented to the execution of no doubtful powers; and yet they have assented to this series of national celebrations, so similar in their nature and objects to that now proposed. And if you ask, where did they obtain their power? my answer is, where could they have obtained their power excepting under that grant contained in the eighth section of the first article, which my friends from Ohio and Kentucky would tell you is utterly without sense or meaning per se, although the words are capable of direct meaning, and have, we are bound to presume, some definite object and intent?

Now, sir, can it be that we have constitutional powers to send out distant expeditions of a purely scientific character, that we shall send delegations of our own citizens and provide for their expenses to foreign exhibitions, and be unable to do the same thing in our own country? As I said, it is plain to me that, under the commercial clause in the Constitution, the power to create this international exhibition is reasonably to be found. The question of its expediency is a totally different thing, which I do not propose in this connection to discuss.

Then, as to the other point, of providing money for a national celebration, it seems to me to be an inherent power. You cannot create a government without giving necessarily incidental powers of this nature. Any exercise of power by the Government of the United States which shall restrict individual liberty, which shall invade and impair the right of a State, which shall in any degree destroy that balance of power which is after all the great scheme which was intended for our Government, I shall watch with jealousy, and my vote shall ever oppose. I have differed with my learned friends from Ohio and Kentucky on points of greater constitutional importance than the present. I may say that one of them expressed, and both of them coincided in, the view that it was within the power of the Senate of the United States to unseat one of its members by a majority vote by declaring his seat vacant. That was their opinion. It was a question of profound importance; one in which I differed from them, because the proposition was, to my mind, fraught with such danger that I could not assent to it. I knew that it would lead to the destruction of the right of States to representation in the Senate, and deal a blow which would shatter our Federal system from turret to foundation-stone. And yet my honorable friends held a different opinion on that subject. But in this case—which, as I said, affects no question of individual liberty, no question of power over States or persons; which is a simple matter of expenditure in respect to a subject that is confessedly and purely national, neither local nor sectional, nor capable of being affected either by State or sectional authority—I find that they take again a different, and, if I may so term it, a still more conservative and restricted, view than I, and denounce the idea that power can be found under the Constitution of the United States to enable the nation to create or celebrate any holiday.

Mr. President, it is in the conflict of honest minds that truth is generated. I never regret discussions respecting limitations upon the power of Congress. I am glad that they should occur. I am glad that the power of Congress to act should always be carefully weighed and carefully proven. I have opposed, and expect always to oppose, the implication of the grant of unlimited powers to Congress. But while I do that, it will be for the substantial reason that such exercise of powers would plainly tend to overthrow the safeguards of liberty, and to disturb the proper relations of the different parts of our Government. When mere money is the question, and that to be spent in furtherance of a perfectly national object, connecting itself with the commerce of the country, or with the proper and patriotic celebration of events connected with our history as a nation, or when, as I said, the individual liberty of no man is questioned, where the power and right of no State is invaded, then my anxiety to search for defects in the grants of power is greatly lessened; and in the present case I do feel myself, even after listening to the arguments of my friends from Ohio and Kentucky, able to vote for a proper appropriation to celebrate this centennial anniversary of the birth of the Government of the United States. With me the question is not so much as to the amount to be appropriated, but as to the principle involved in appropriating any amount at all. It seems to me that it is a natural incident to the existence of the Government that it should have this right to celebrate. Nor do I consider it a dangerous incident to the powers of the Government to permit the creation by Government of national holidays, and provide means for their celebration. I can see no danger in it. I cannot see the violation of principle in it. I cannot see the infraction of constitutional power in it.

Mr. President, passing now from these reasons, which I have been urged to give at the more length because of my respect for the sources from which the objections come, and which always impress me with much doubt when I find myself differing with men whose views generally in regard to our Government are so coincident with what I believe to be right, yet at the same time I desire to say one word in respect to a practical point in relation to the appropriation of money. This money, if I am to vote for the bill, must be devoted to national purposes only, to be expended under the direction and control of United States officials. I understand that to be secured. Further, I desire that the amount should pass under the inspection of the usual Committee on Appropriations, that we may not be appropriating money without having some proper basis of information as to amount and probable requirements; and next, that this amount of money appropriated by Congress shall, in the event of the success of this exhibition, or in the event of the sale of the buildings erected in part by this money, be returned to the Treasury of the United States in equal proportion with the other moneys that may be subscribed by individuals for the purpose of aiding the same thing.

I trust, indeed I am assured by my honorable friend from Pennsylvania who has been urging the passage of this measure, that it is intended to perfect it by providing that the moneys appropriated by the United States for this purpose shall be returned again to the Treasury of the United States; that from the proceeds of the receipts of the buildings for the purposes of the exhibition and from the sale of the buildings or materials the Government of the United States shall receive in due proportion the full amount to which it would be entitled as a shareholder in this concern. The fact that it is proposed to do this by a stock company, by allowing persons in that form to subscribe, does not in the least degree interfere with the propriety or the practicability of this arrangement.

Nor is there anything in the nature of an international exhibition which interferes at all with the proper commemoration and celebration of the birthday of our Government. Indeed, in my opinion, the international exhibition, continuing for a period of some four or five months, will form one of the chief causes of attraction of our people to the place where the celebration of American independence is held, and the rejoicing over the first century in the history of our Government will be chiefly in the hearts of the American people. But a small portion of them can assemble at any one place in this country; and, as I said, if it is to have value, it must be because the hearts of the American people give it value, for money cannot do that; but still money may aid the expression of vast numbers, and serve to impress the event which we commemorate, and revive the sentiments which gave birth to it. All these things will not be interfered with by the attractions of the deposit in the warehouses and buildings established by the Government of the curiosities of art, of literature, of science, of industry, and of manufactures of all kinds brought from foreign countries. On the contrary, the international feature will only tend to swell the success of the exhibition. And there is nothing in the declarations of the sentiments of pride which the American people may desire to express on that occasion that can be held just cause of offense to any one.

I pass by the idea that seems to be so absurdly pressed—I say that without disrespect—that the personal presence of the rulers of other countries is to be expected. Nothing of the kind. The international exhibition is a matter of commerce and business, and the same general character of representation will be there that we ourselves sent abroad. The invitation is not to come here and receive a royal welcome as royal guests, and travel in state through the country at public expense. That idea is preposterous. There is nothing in the language of the law or the invitations issued which would warrant such an idea for a moment. I do not know what may have happened in Europe between crowned heads who have become the personal guests of each other; but we have no such machinery of government, and what I do know is that American commissioners, or the representatives of the American Government, were not the guests received at the expense of the governments whose exhibitions they attended.

Therefore I trust, Mr. President, that this bill will pass, and that the Committee on Appropriations will be properly instructed, that they may know what is the will of the Senate on the subject, whether there is to be a sufficient amount of money appropriated to defray the reasonable anticipated cost of this proceeding, and that it shall be coupled with safeguards as to its expenditure, and as to the return to the United States of their share, if any there be, of the proceeds of this exhibition after the expenses have been fully paid and the exhibition is over. This bill being prepared with these safeguards shall then receive my vote. But the Senate have it in their power to declare whether there shall or shall not be a national celebration.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not propose to prolong this discussion to-day. I have no doubt this subject will be before us again unless the bill be rejected; and I shall then have an opportunity, after having seen the remarks of my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] and those of my friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] to reply to their view of the Constitution if I shall consider it of any consequence whatsoever to do so. Owing to my service on a committee of the Senate which is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, I had not the pleasure of hearing the constitutional argument of either of those gentlemen, though I heard a part of that of the Senator from Delaware. The very high respect I entertain for their legal ability may induce me to say something in reply to their views when I have an opportunity to read them. My purpose in rising now is simply to correct an error into which my friend from Delaware has fallen in regard to the relief afforded to Ireland in 1847. He read from the remarks made by several Senators on a bill introduced by Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, appropriating $500,000 out of the public Treasury to purchase food to be sent to relieve the famine then prevailing in Ireland. I asked him if that bill did not fail in the House. I understood him to say that it did not, but that it became a law.

Mr. BAYARD. My answer was that I had not the history before me. I was looking in the record of the Senate debates, and I stated expressly what had occurred in the Senate, and gave the vote in the Senate. I did not undertake to follow it in the House, but my impression was that the bill had passed.

Mr. THURMAN. I understood the Senator to state it simply as an impression that the bill had passed; and he naturally thought so from the fact that the Macedonian, one of our ships of war, did go from our shores to Ireland charged with grain and food supplied by the private contributions of citizens from the United States. But now I say to him that the bill introduced by Mr. Crittenden, and making an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States, although it passed the Senate, never did pass the House of Representatives; nor did the Government make any appropriation of money for any such purpose. On the contrary, all the Government did was this: Senator Fairfield, of Maine, introduced a joint resolution lending, so to speak, the ship Macedonian and the corvette or sloop-of-war Jamestown to the persons who had contributed supplies for the relief of that famine, in order that those supplies might be transmitted to Ireland and to Scotland, and that joint resolution passed both Houses; and the Macedonian went out freighted with those contributions of private individuals; and so far was Congress from appropriating money that it struck out the little appropriation of $6,000 from the public Treasury that was contained in the original resolution; and the ship went forth, not in the command of an officer of the United States Navy, but in the command of an officer of the mercantile marine who was selected as a proper person to have charge of that vessel. All the Government did was to loan a vessel of the United States that was lying idle in one of our dock-yards to the contributors for the relief of the suffering people of Ireland and Scotland.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the case stands thus: The Senator makes it a point that you may take Government property, expensive and costly as we know a Government ship to be, and you may use it for a purpose of public charity, but you may not take the public property that exists in the shape of money. It strikes me, to be perfectly plain, that you cannot do indirectly what you cannot do directly; and what difference, in the name of all that is reasonable, is there to the people of the United States when you say to them, "Before we took your money we turned it into a ship, and when we had it in the shape of a ship we used it for certain purposes that we could not have used it for if it had remained in the shape of money?"

Mr. THURMAN. If my friend from Delaware cannot see any difference I will try to show him the difference some of these days when we get this matter up. If the Macedonian had been built for that purpose, then he might well enough say there was no difference between going to the Treasury and giving the money directly and taking the money from the Treasury to build a ship to carry on the project. But the Macedonian was not built for that purpose. She was a conquest. She was taken on the high seas by the frigate United States. She was a capture, and at the time that we lent her for this charitable purpose she was lying idle at our navy-yards. All, then, that the United States did was to lend a ship of the United States.

Mr. STOCKTON. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STOCKTON. It is as to a matter simply of fact, which perhaps the Senator knows. The two ships authorized by Congress to be sent out at the time of the Vienna exposition cost $250,000, which was in the naval appropriation bill. They were United States ships sent out for that purpose under the orders of Congress to carry the merchandise of the exhibitors from this country; so that the proposition he is making in reference to the Macedonian does not apply to this last action of Congress in reference to the Vienna exposition.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not making an argument. I am only vindicating the truth of history, as Colonel Benton used to say. As to the value of the precedents, we shall talk about that at some other time. If my friends suppose that I am asserting that the Constitution has never been violated in my humble judgment, that this clause of the Constitution has not been stretched beyond all proper limits, and things done under it that cannot be defended on any proper view of the Constitution; if they understood me as denying that such things have been done, I beg leave to say that I have never denied any such thing. I do not suppose there ever was a constitution made that was not violated, and I feel very certain—and I feel quite sure that my friends will agree with me—that the Constitution of the United States has been violated too long and too often, and that its violation ought not to be the rule of our action.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. Will the gentleman give way to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania gave notice that he was going to ask his friends to sit this bill out to-day. I think we had better take a vote on this motion; he will be here in a moment.

Mr. SUMNER. There are several yet to speak.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. RAMSEY. Had we not better go into executive session; there is executive business, I suggest to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I will change the motion, and move an executive session.

Mr. THURMAN. If that motion is withdrawn for a moment I ask consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. THURMAN. I send it to the Chair to be read. It is important that it should be passed at once.

The SECRETARY read the resolution appropriating money to defray the expenses of the joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON. I object to that.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator object to the consideration of that resolution now?

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly I do. I made an appeal yesterday to the Senate which I thought would not be objected to, and I said I trusted the Senate would allow us to finish the centennial business to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. Is that in order? There is a motion to go into executive session, which is not debatable.

Mr. CAMERON. That was withdrawn.

Mr. SUMNER. Withdrawn merely for the purpose of the introduction of a resolution, that was all; and the Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe I held the floor, and gave way for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON in the chair.) The Chair thought the Senator from California had yielded the floor.

Mr. STEWART. Simply for a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. SARGENT. Only for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But that was suspended to enable the Senator from Ohio to introduce a resolution.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well, then I resume the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection was made to the consideration of the resolution, so that the Senator from California is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SARGENT. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada renew his motion?

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SUMNER, The motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his point of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. My point of order is that the Senator from Nevada moved that the Senate adjourn, and then withdrew the motion. If the Senator from Pennsylvania, who happened to be out at the moment, and who had charge of this bill, is not to be allowed the privilege of making a statement to the Senate, then we shall endeavor to administer the rules as they are. A Senator cannot withdraw a motion for one purpose. He either withdraws it or insists on it. Having withdrawn it, the Senator from Pennsylvania has the right to the floor.

Mr. CAMERON. So I thought.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada withdrew his motion temporarily.

Mr. STEWART. I do not wish to cut off the Senator. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask leave to withdraw the resolution. I will offer it at another time when the Senator from Pennsylvania is in better humor.

Mr. CAMERON. I am sure——

Mr. SARGENT. Am I entitled to the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from California had yielded the floor to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SARGENT. Merely for the purpose of making a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He made his motion, and afterward withdrew it, whereupon the Senator from Pennsylvania took the floor, and the Chair so recognized him.

Mr. SARGENT. I would suggest to the Chair that his withdrawing the motion does not take me from the floor and give it to another Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from California had yielded the floor absolutely to the Senator from Nevada, and the Senator from Nevada made his motion to go into executive session.

Mr. SARGENT. I beg leave to correct the Chair. I did not yield the floor absolutely. I simply yielded for the purpose of the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state his understanding again——

Mr. CAMERON. I understand I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires that Senators shall understand the ruling of the Chair. The Senator from California moved that the Senate adjourn——

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; I rose to speak on the pending bill, and was recognized for that purpose, as I supposed. Then the Senator from Nevada appealed to me to give way for a motion to adjourn, which I did.

Mr. STEWART. Then several Senators said they wanted an executive session, and so I changed the motion to an executive session.

Mr. SCOTT. In the mean time, let me inquire how the Senator from Ohio got his resolution in? The floor was yielded to him.

Mr. SUMNER. By unanimous consent.

Mr. SCOTT. My colleague was recognized after that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada withdrew his motion temporarily. The Senator from Ohio then introduced his resolution. Objection was made to its present consideration, and thereupon he withdrew it. The Senator from Nevada renewed his motion and then withdrew it, and thereupon the Chair recognized the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON. For which I am very much obliged to the Chair. And now, Mr. President, I am surprised that anybody should object to going on with this bill. I am sure the kindly feelings of the Senator from California will not allow him to object any further to going on with this bill now——

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to making what few remarks I have to make now; but I understand there are other Senators who wish to speak. It is nearly five o'clock, and I do not suppose the bill can be finished to-night. I cannot speak for others, however.

Mr. CAMERON. I made an appeal yesterday, hoping we would finish the bill to-night; and I do not find in the Senate anybody, except my good friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, who objects. Somehow or other, latterly, when I have an appeal to make to the Senate, he always seems to be in the objective case.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg my friend's pardon. Do not broaden the case. I do not sympathize with my friend in his effort to push a bill which I think is going to entangle the Treasury to a great many millions of dollars—ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five possibly; and I do not sympathize with my friend in his effort to bring about that entanglement. That is all.

Mr. CAMERON. Now, in reply to that I have not a word to say. There is no gentleman in this body for whom I have a higher respect than I have for the Senator from Massachusetts; and whether we differ or whether we agree makes no difference in our personal relations; but I did ask of him, and I did ask of the Senate, that we should decide this question now. It can be no great trouble to the Senate, no great inconvenience to sit an hour or two hours, so as to dispose of this bill; and whatever may be the vote of the Senator from Massachusetts or anybody else, I shall not complain. But I want the decision made to-night; and I shall be greatly obliged to the Senate if they will refuse to adjourn until they settle this question. That is all I have to say about it. Gentlemen may very fairly differ about the propriety of an appropriation, or about a celebration at all. Of that I have no complaint to make. But I want the decision to be made now. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. With the permission of the Senator from California, for the purpose of testing whether we will dispose of the bill now or let him go on in the morning, I move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SARGENT. I am willing to leave the matter entirely to the Senate, either to go on or not just as the Senate pleases. In order that it may be decided by the Senate, I will yield that the motion may be made, and will cheerfully assent to whatever the decision of the Senate may be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CAMERON. The motion of the Senator from Nevada is a mere evasion to go into executive session. We have no executive business to do now, and going there is only an evasion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the motion of the Senator from Nevada is not debatable. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON. I know it is not debatable, but I made that suggestion to the Senator himself, and hoped he would withdraw his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were—21——

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President——

Mr. SUMNER. I call the Senator to order.
Mr. CAMERON. How am I out of order?
Mr. SUMNER. The vote is being taken and the Senator cannot speak now.
The PRESIDING OFFICER, (having concluded the count.) There are 21 in the affirmative and 19 in the negative. The motion is agreed to.
Mr. CAMERON. Now I call for the yeas and nays.
Mr. SUMNER. It is too late. The result has been announced.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the call.
The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.
Mr. LOGAN, (after first voting in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, Mr. SCHURZ, and I ask leave to withdraw my vote.
Leave was granted.
The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Chandler, Cooper, Davis, Fenton, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, McCreery, Merrimon. Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Pratt, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, and Thurman—25.
NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Buckingham, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pease, Ramsey, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, West, and Wright—22.
ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Carpenter, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, Robertson, Schurz, Stevenson, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—26.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 5, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order of business.
Mr. SHANKS. Some days ago I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected a bill (H. R. No. 825) to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by the authority of Congress, and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the county where published. I wish to call that motion up for consideration at this time.
The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote with the prevailing side?
Mr. SHANKS. I did.
Mr. McKEE. Will that cut off the morning hour?
The SPEAKER. It is a privileged question, and would crowd out the morning hour if it should occupy much time.
Mr. COTTON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.
Mr. SHANKS. I have not yielded the floor. Unless there is a disposition on the part of the House to debate the bill, (and I should like to say something on it myself,) I will now demand the previous question.
Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether when a motion to reconsider is called up by the mover it is in order to raise the question of consideration at a particular time, as in the case of the introduction of a bill; whether it is in the power of the House to decline at a particular time to proceed to the consideration of the question?
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be.
Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire, then, to raise that question.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the reading of the rule.
The Clerk read as follows:

When any motion or proposition is made, the question "Will the House now consider it?" shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker. And it is competent for a member to raise the question of consideration upon a report, even though a question of privilege is involved in the report. But after a question has been stated, and its discussion commenced, it is too late to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. This is not a question of privilege, but it is a privileged question, which is not quite so high in rank as a question of privilege. And the rule, although not specifically applying to a privileged question, the Chair would be compelled to rule, includes it.
Mr. RANDALL. It makes no difference, if there is a majority in favor of considering it, which is equivalent to a reconsideration.
The SPEAKER. It is the same thing. It is a mere question of testing the sense of the House. As the Chair has often remarked, it leaves the whole question within the power of the majority.
Mr. G. F. HOAR. The Chair will pardon me for saying that I supposed the majority of the House could determine the question of consideration by a yea and nay vote. But as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] does not propose to take up the time of the House by a discussion, I withdraw the question of consideration.
The SPEAKER. Pending the call of the gentleman from Indiana for the previous question on the motion to reconsider, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] moves to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.
The question being taken on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to pass the bill, there were—ayes 43, noes not counted.
Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I ask for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 124, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bradley, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Dobbins, Duell, Eames, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Gooch, Eugene Hale, John T. Harris, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamison, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Luttrell, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McNulta, Merriam, Milliken, Monroe, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Pendleton, Phelps, Poland, Potter, Rawls, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sherwood, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Storm, Sypher, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodford—102.
NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Barry, Begole, Bell, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crittenden, Crutchfield, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, DeWitt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Field, Freeman, Glover, Gunckel, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Houghton, Howe, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamport, Leach, Lewis, Lowe, Magee, Marshall, Martin, Alexander S. McDill, McJunkin, McKee, McLean, Mills, Myers, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, O'Brien, Orr, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Perry, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Randall, Rapier, Ray, Read, Rice, Richmond, Rusk, Sawyer, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloss, A. Herr Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Stone, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Vance, Wallace, Walls, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—124.
NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barrere, Bass, Biery, Roderick R. Butler, Clements, Comingo, Creamer, Crocker, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Gerry W. Hazelton, Herndon, Hodges, Hooper, Hubbell, Hunter, Jewett, Lansing, Lofland, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, Mellish, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Niles, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Sessions, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, George L. Smith, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Swann, Thomas, Waddell, Wells, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—64.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.
During the roll-call the following announcements were made:
Mr. PARSONS. I am paired with Mr. RAINEY, of South Carolina. If he were present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."
Mr. SENER. I was not in the House when the last name on the roll was called. If I had voted I would have voted "no."
Mr. ALBRIGHT. My colleague, Mr. BIERY, is absent on account of sickness. He directs me to say that if he were here he would vote "no."
Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. My colleague, Mr. HUNTER, is absent from the city on business of the House.
Mr. ARCHER. My colleague, Mr. SWANN, is detained from the House by sickness.
Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, is detained from the House in consequence of severe illness. He has not been here for some days.
Mr. BARRERE. I am paired with Mr. CROCKER, of Massachusetts. If he were here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."
The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.
Mr. SHANKS. I now call the previous question on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to pass the bill.
Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division on seconding the previous question.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. SHANKS, and his colleague, Mr. HOLMAN.
The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 121, noes 50.
So the previous question was seconded.
The question recurred on ordering the main question.
Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. O'NEILL called for the yeas and nays.
On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 39.
So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 103, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Barry, Begole, Bell, Bowen, Bright, Buckner, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crittenden, Crutchfield, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, DeWitt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Freeman, Glover, Gunckel, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, Houghton, Howe, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamport, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowe, Magee, Marshall, Martin, Alexander S. McDill, McJunkin, McLean, Mills, Moore, Myers, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, O'Brien, Orr, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Perry, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Randall, Rapier, Ray, Read, Rice, Richmond, Rusk, Sawyer, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloss

J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Stone, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Vance, Wallace, Walls, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Woodworth, and John D. Young—123.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bradley, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Dobbins, Duell, Eames, Field, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, John T. Harris, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamison, Lawson, Luttrell, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Milliken, Monroe, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Page, Pendleton, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Potter, Pratt, Rawls, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sherwood, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Storm, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodford—103.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Biery, Roderick R. Butler, Clements, Comingo, Creamer, Crocker, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Fort, Giddings, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Benjamin W. Harris, Hendee, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Hubbell, Hunter, Jewett, Lansing, Lawrence, Lofland, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, Mellish, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Niles, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Phillips, Pierce, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Robbins, James W. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, George L. Smith, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Swann, Sypher, Thomas, Waddell, Wells, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Pierce M. B. Young—64.

So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BARRERE said: I am paired upon this question with Mr. CROCKER; if he were present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

The result of the vote having been announced, as above recorded, the question recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was defeated.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order.

Mr. POTTER and Mr. E H. ROBERTS called for the yeas and nays.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays; and on a division there were—ayes 32, noes 123.

So (one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 122, nays 106, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Barry, Begole, Bell, Bowen, Bright, Buckner, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, DeWitt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Field, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Houghton, Howe, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamport, Leach, Lewis, Lowe, Magee, Marshall, Martin, Alexander S. McDill, McJunkin, McLean, Mills, Moore, Myers, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, O'Brien, Orr, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Perry, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Randall, Rapier, Ray, Read, Rice, Richmond, Rusk, Sawyer, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sloss, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Stone, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Vance, Wallace, Walls, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Woodworth, and John D. Young—122.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bradley, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Dobbins, Duell, Eames, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, John T. Harris, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamison, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Luttrell, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Monroe, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Page, Pendleton, Phelps, Potter, Pratt, Rawls, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sherwood, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Storm, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodford—106.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barrere, Bass, Biery, Roderick R. Butler, Clements, Comingo, Creamer, Crocker, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Benjamin W. Harris, Hodges, Hooper, Hubbell, Hunter, Jewett, Lansing, Lofland, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, McKee, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Niles, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Poland, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Robbins, James W. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Swann, Sypher, Thomas, Waddell, Wells, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Pierce M. B. Young—62.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SHANKS. I now move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with instructions to report forthwith a substitute covering substantially the points embraced in the bill I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will strike out the word "forthwith."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. SHANKS. I will make that modification.

The SPEAKER. That would require a suspension of the rules. A majority of the House cannot order the committee to report forthwith or authorize it to report at any time. A simple motion to recommit with instructions is in order.

Mr. McKEE. Cannot I put in an amendment there?

Mr. TYNER. I desire to move to amend the motion of my colleague, [Mr. SHANKS,] so as to instruct the committee to report back the third section of the bill only.

Mr. PACKER. I call for a division of the question, so that we may have a vote first on the question of instructions, and then on recommittal.

The SPEAKER. It is not competent under the rules to call for a division of a motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. SHANKS. I have not yielded the floor. I have been waiting to hear the instructions I have offered read, that I may call the previous question; but I will now ask the previous question.

The proposed substitute was read as follows:

A bill to enable Members and Delegates of both Houses of Congress to do the public business with their constituents and with the other departments of the Government, and to limit the franking privilege to certain newspapers.

Be it enacted, &c., That during any session of Congress, and for thirty days prior and subsequent thereto, all written and printed matter, and none other, sent to a Member or Delegate of either House of Congress, and the answers to such correspondence, and all written or printed matter, and such other things as have been or may be ordered by either or both Houses of Congress for distribution to the people, bearing upon the outside of the envelope or package the words "For public service," with the signature of a Member or Delegate of either House of Congress, and none other, shall go free of postage.

SEC. 2. That all newspapers regularly printed as journals, and not advertising sheets simply, shall go free of postage through the mails in the county where the same are published: Provided, That this shall not entitle them to free delivery in the towns and cities where such delivery is provided by law.

SEC. 3. That all postal matter shall have the postage prepaid thereon: Provided, That when any postmaster receiving postal matter is satisfied that full postage was intended to be paid thereon, but by accident or mistake the full sum has not been prepaid, such postal matter shall be forwarded, and any deficit thereon marked on such postal matter and collected on delivery.

SEC. 4. That whoever shall procure to be used the signature of any Member or Delegate of either House of Congress, or shall use any such signature to forward through the mails any postal matter whatever, of or concerning the private business of any Member or Delegate of either House of Congress, or of and concerning any matter of private interest only of such Member or Delegate of either House of Congress, or of any other person, or on any advertisement, circular, printed or written, or business or advertising card, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction to try criminal cases in any district of the United States, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than six months, and not more than two years, and by a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $500, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Is it in order to move an amendment to the instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is not pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. TYNER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, whether the motion to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole would take precedence of the motion to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question shall not be seconded, then the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If this motion to recommit is not carried, then is not this bill thrown into the hands of its friends, by all parliamentary usage and decisions I have heard?

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman puts the question——

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This bill was once voted down by a large majority.

Mr. RANDALL. That vote has been reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot determine in advance with what motives the motion to reconsider was agreed to; whether for the purpose of amending or of passing the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to get the child back to its mother. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The mother abandoned it.

Mr. KASSON. It may be important to understand what is the exact question before the House. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] as stated by him, was to commit this bill with instructions to report back a substitute covering substantially the points embraced in the bill which has been read. The bill which has been read is simply a restoration of the old franking privilege. If that is the exact bill which is to be reported back, we ought to understand it. If the motion is to report back substantially the bill, then that leaves an opening for a change.

Mr. SHANKS. That is almost a speech. There have been some amendments made to the bill which has been read.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate and of argument.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the vote on seconding the previous question to be taken by tellers, and will appoint as such tellers the two gentlemen from Indiana, Mr. SHANKS and Mr. TYNER.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the previous question is voted down, what is next in order? I do not understand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not tell.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is not there a motion pending by the other gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TYNER?]

The SPEAKER. If the call for the previous question shall be voted down, the Chair will undoubtedly recognize the other teller. When there are two tellers representing the opposite sides of a question it is the duty of the Chair to recognize the teller representing the prevailing side. Therefore the Chair would recognize the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TYNER,] who opposed the motion to recommit, should the previous question not be seconded.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman submitted a motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That motion was not in order.

Mr. TYNER. I give notice that I will submit that motion if the previous question is voted down.

Mr. SHANKS. I think these speeches are very much against me. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The tellers will take their places. Debate is not in order.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 102, noes 74.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was, Shall the main question now be put?

Mr. TYNER. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 42 in the affirmative, (more than one-fifth of the last vote.)

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 122, nays 112, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Bell, Bowen, Buckner, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Crutchfield, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, DeWitt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Field, Giddings, Glover, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Platt, Randall, Rapier, Ray, Read, Rice, Richmond, Rusk, Sawyer, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sloss, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Vance, Wallace, Walls, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, and John D. Young—122.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bass, Beck, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Curtis, Eames, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, John T. Harris, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hyde, Kasson, Kellogg, Lamison, Lawrence, Lawson, Luttrell, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Monroe, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Parsons, Pendleton, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Potter, Pratt, Rawls, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sherwood, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodford, and Woodworth—112.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Biery, Roderick R. Butler, Comingo, Corwin, Creamer, Crocker, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Duell, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Freeman, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, Hodges, Hooper, Hunter, Jewett, Lansing, Lofland, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Niles, Hosea W. Parker, Pierce, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Robbins, James W. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Swann, Sypher, Thomas, Waddell, Wells, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—56.

So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. COX said: I am requested to announce that my colleague, Mr. WOOD, is paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. ADAMS; my colleague, if present would vote "no," while the gentleman from Kentucky would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was presented by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 253) for the relief of Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States in New York City;

An act (H. R. No. 429) creating an additional land district in the Territory of New Mexico;

An act (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa;

An act (H. R. No. 1284) authorizing the chief clerk of the War Department to sign requisitions on the Treasury during the temporary absence of the Secretary of War;

An act (H. R. No. 1759) for the relief of Henry S. Welles;

An act (H. R. No. 1920) to amend the fifteenth section of an act approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department;"

An act (H. R. No. 2076) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of the cutter Relief as a revenue-cutter, and use said vessel for a boarding-station in Mobile Bay; and

An act (H. R. No. 2201) to render available a certain unexpended balance of appropriation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to John A. Fisher.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed House bill of the following title, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies."

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 477) granting a pension to Jemima Maxwell;

An act (S. No. 518) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Skinner;

An act (S. No. 539) granting a pension to Eugene Smith; and

An act (S. No. 540) granting a pension to Fanny Newcomb, mother of Irenus Newcomb, late of Company H, Sixth Regiment Vermont Volunteers.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] to recommit the bill with instructions to report the substitute which has been read at the desk.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 24, noes not counted.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question again recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] to recommit the bill with instructions to report the substitute which has been read.

Mr. TYNER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I ask to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order.

Mr. SPEER. Is it in order to have a division of the question upon the pending motion?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask to make a parliamentary inquiry. When the committee shall report back this bill, will it not be open for amendment?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

A MEMBER. If they ever do report it back.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The time to offer amendments will be when the bill is reported back.

The SPEAKER. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER,] the Chair directs the Clerk to read an extract from the rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

A division of the question is not in order on a motion to commit with instructions, or on the different branches of instructions.

The SPEAKER. It is only in order to amend the instructions by adding to them.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I ask to have my amendment read.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. TYNER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the motion to recommit with these instructions be voted down, will it not be in order to make another motion to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It will not, because the main question has just been ordered, and will operate until the bill is disposed of. If the House should refuse to recommit with instructions, the next vote will be on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill of the committee?

The SPEAKER. On the passage of the bill reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, is there no chance for making any amendment?

The SPEAKER. There is only one mode by which the bill could be amended; and that is by reconsidering the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. If the bill be recommitted, can the gentleman who may report it back call the previous question upon it and cut off any amendment?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question be demanded, and should be seconded by a majority of the House, amendments would be cut off.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. If the motion to recommit be carried, can the bill be reported back immediately?

The SPEAKER. It could not. The bill could not be reported until the next call of the committee. It would require a suspension of the rules to change the time when the committee would be enabled to report. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] has demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question will now be taken on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with instructions to report the substitute which has been read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To report substantially that substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts insists on inserting in the motion the word "substantially;" but the Chair does not recognize that as a parliamentary word. The Chair does not understand what that word would imply.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the Chair will allow me, I will explain. I do not think any bill is perfect; and a committee, according to my view, may be instructed to embody the principle of a bill in proper language, without being bound to adhere literally to the exact words of the measure in question.

The SPEAKER. If the motion as put should include the word "substantially," the House would not vote upon any definitive proposition; because "substantially" is a word which might admit of wider or narrower construction, according to the views of particular individuals. Upon a question put in that form members would not know what they were voting upon. They must either vote for a distinct proposition or vote against it. Still the Chair is willing to have the gentleman make his own explanation. The pending vote is to recommit this bill with instructions to report back that which has been read at the Clerk's desk. Of course that is subject to amendment in the House afterward.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Subject to amendment in the House afterward. Then that is all right.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. If that is voted down, do we not come directly to this bill?

The SPEAKER. Directly.

Mr. RANDALL. Nothing can interpose?

The SPEAKER. Nothing.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 182, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Arthur, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bell, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Durham, Eldredge, Freeman, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, Herndon, Hersey, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Kelley, Kendall, Lamar, Leach, Alexander S. McDill, McJunkin, Moore, Myers, Negley, James H. Platt, jr., Pratt, Rapier, Shanks, Sheats, Sloss, Snyder, Stowell, Strawbridge, Taylor, Todd, Townsend, Wallace, Walls, and Wilshire—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bass, Beck, Begole, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, DeWitt, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kellogg, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lamport, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowe, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Randall, Rawls, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Henry W. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sherwood, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Strait, Thornburgh, Tremain, Tyner, Vance, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodford, Woodworth, and John D. Young—182.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Barrere, Biery, Roderick R. Butler, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Creamer, Crocker, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, Hays, Hodges, Hooper, Hunter, Jewett, Lansing, Lofland, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, Hosea W. Parker, Pierce, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Ray, Read, Richmond, Robbins, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Sessions, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, J. Ambler Smith, George L. Smith, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Swann, Sypher, Thomas, Waddell, Wells, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—63.

So the House refused to recommit the bill.

During the vote

Mr. BARRERE said: I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CROCKER, on this bill generally. I do not know exactly how he would vote on this motion, but I suppose in the affirmative; I would vote in the negative.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask by unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. SHANKS. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It is still pending; there is nothing else in order.

Mr. COTTON. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 72, noes 78.

Mr. COX. I demand the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 113.

Mr. COX demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So (one-fifth of those present not having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question next recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the bill be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. SHANKS demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 111, nays 119, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Begole, Bell, Bowen, Bright, Buckner, Burchard, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crutchfield, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, DeWitt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Field, Glover, Gunckel, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Willard, George Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodford—120.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Barrere, Biery, Roderick R. Butler, Clements, Comingo, Creamer, Crocker, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Duell, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Freeman, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, Hersey, Hodges, Hooper, Hunter, Jewett, Lansing, Lofland, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Nunn, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pierce, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Robbins, William H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Swann, Sypher, Waddell, Wells, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—59.

So the House refused to pass the bill.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. PARSONS. On this bill I am paired with Mr. RAINEY, of South Carolina. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. CLEMENTS. I am paired with Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. If he were here, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. COX. My colleague, Mr. WOOD, is paired with Mr. ADAMS, of Kentucky. Mr. WOOD is against the whole franking business, and Mr. ADAMS would vote on the other side.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is it in order to move to reconsider the vote just taken?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The vote by which the House refused to pass the bill has been reconsidered once.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] that he desires to make a report from the Committee on Elections, which it is supposed will occupy very little time.

VIRGINIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. PIKE. I am instructed by the Committee on Elections to report the following resolutions:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Alexander M. Davis is not entitled to a seat in the Forty-third Congress, as a Representative from the fifth congressional district from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That the contestant, Christopher Y. Thomas, is entitled to a seat in the Forty-third Congress as a Representative from the fifth congressional district from the State of Virginia.

Mr. LAMAR. There is also a minority report, which I desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon the evidence before the committee the undersigned do not dissent from the resolutions reported. But as the testimony of the contestant was taken after the time allowed by law, and for this reason the contestee did not take the testimony which he alleges he otherwise would have taken, we are of the opinion that his request for further time should have been granted.

R. M. SPEER,
L. Q. C. LAMAR.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee. The question will be taken on the resolutions separately, and the Clerk will report the first.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Alexander M. Davis is not entitled to a seat in the Forty-third Congress as a Representative from the fifth congressional district of the State of Virginia.

Mr. SPEER. I did not understand that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] intended to request immediate action upon the resolutions. I do not oppose them myself, but I thought that perhaps the sitting member might desire to be heard. I do not know whether he is in the Hall or not. It was not my understanding that immediate action was to be had on the resolutions.

Mr. PIKE. I understand that that was the understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was informed by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] who represented the respective sides, that the case was to be submitted for immediate action.

Mr. PIKE. That was the distinct understanding.

Mr. SPEER. I see that the sitting member is in the Hall. But unless he wishes to say something I have nothing further to say.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the contestant, Christopher Y. Thomas, is entitled to a seat in the Forty-third Congress as a Representative from the fifth congressional district of the State of Virginia.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the votes by which the resolutions were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS appeared and qualified by taking the modified oath of July 11, 1868.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, for the purpose of general debate.

Mr. HAYS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] yield to me that I may offer a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. GARFIELD. I prefer not to yield.

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD'S motion, and it was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The first reading of the bill will be omitted, unless objection be made.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the omission of the first reading of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether any arrangement has been made as to the length of time to be allowed for general debate. I desire to be heard.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have made no suggestion, and shall not at present, until gentlemen are heard who desire to be heard, for limiting general debate. It is important that we should go forward as rapidly as we can with the bill; for our business in the Committee of the Whole, especially as regards appropriation bills, is behind. But on a bill that has so many sides to it as this I should not feel like making any suggestions now as to limiting debate. I would rather let the temper of the House in Committee of the Whole first manifest itself on that question. If gentlemen do not wish now to omit the first reading of the bill I suppose it can be waived for the present.

Mr. RANDALL. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the first reading of the bill is for the present omitted. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I regret that I have to ask the attention of the Committee of the Whole at so late an hour of the day; but in the present condition of the public business I am unwilling longer to delay the consideration of the appropriation bills.

The bill now pending before the Committee of the Whole is the best gauge by which to measure the magnitude and cost of the national Government. Its provisions extend to every leading function of the Government in the three great departments—legislative, executive, and judicial—and includes the civil functions of the military and naval establishments. It appropriates for all the salaries and contingent expenses of all the officers and employés of the civil service. If its provisions could be thrown upon canvas, they would form an outline map exhibiting the form, the character, and the magnitude of the Government of the United States.

This is the proper stand-point from which to study the public expenditures, to examine the relation of expenditures to taxation, and of both to the prosperity and well-being of the nation.

What the House may do with this bill will be the test of what they will do with the appropriation bills generally. Their action upon this bill will lay the base line from which the scale of our expenditures for the coming fiscal year is to be measured; and it is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, that I ask the attention of the House, not only to the bill, but to the larger question of our expenditures and our revenues. A very wise man said many years ago, concerning the finances of a European kingdom, that if one of their annual budgets alone should survive the next deluge, if it were the only fragment left after dry land appeared, from that annual budget alone could be read and reconstructed the entire history of the nation.

A government is an artificial giant, and the power that moves it money—money raised by taxation and distributed to the various parts of the body-politic according to the discretion of the legislative power.

NECESSARY EXPENDITURES THE BASIS OF FINANCIAL POLICY.

The necessary expenditures of the Government form the base line from which we measure the amount of our taxation required, and on which we base our system of finance. We have frequently heard it remarked since the session began that we should make our expenditures come within our revenues—that we should "cut our garment according to our cloth." This theory may be correct when applied to private affairs, but it is not applicable to the wants of nations. Our national expenditures should be measured by the real necessities and the proper needs of the Government. We should cut our garment so as to fit the person to be clothed. If he be a giant we must provide cloth sufficient for a fitting garment.

The Committee on Appropriations are seeking earnestly to reduce the expenditures of the Government; but they reject the doctrine that they should at all hazards reduce the expenditures to the level of the revenues, however small those revenues may be. They have attempted rather to ascertain what are the real and vital necessities of the Government; to find what amount of money will suffice to meet all its honorable obligations, to carry on all its necessary and essential functions, to keep alive those public enterprises which the country desires its Government to undertake and accomplish. When the amount of expenses necessary to meet these objects is ascertained, that amount should be appropriated; and ways and means for procuring that amount should be provided.

There are some advantages in the British system of managing their finances. In the annual budget reported to the House of Commons, expenditures and taxation are harnessed together. If appropriations are increased, taxes are correspondingly increased. If appropriations are reduced, a reduction of taxes accompanies the reduction.

On some accounts, it is unfortunate that our work of appropriations is not connected directly with the work of taxation. If this were so, the necessity of taxation would be a constant check upon extravagance, and the practice of economy would promise, as its immediate result, the pleasure of reducing taxation.

Revenues and expenditures may be considered from two points of view: in relation to the people and their industries, and in relation to the Government and the effective working of its machinery.

So far as the people are concerned, they willingly bear the burdens of taxation, when they see that their contributions are honestly and wisely expended to maintain the Government of their choice, and to accomplish those objects which they consider necessary for the general welfare.

So far as the Government is concerned the soundness of its financial affairs depends upon the annual surplus of its revenues over expenditures. A steady and constant revenue drawn from sources that represent the prosperity of the nation—a revenue that grows with the growth of national wealth and is so adjusted to the expenditures that a constant and considerable surplus is annually left in the Treasury above all the necessary current demands; a surplus that keeps the Treasury strong, that holds it above the fear of sudden panic; that makes it impregnable against all private combinations; that makes it a terror to all stock-jobbing and gold-gambling—this is financial health. This is the situation that wise statesmanship should endeavor to support and maintain.

Of course in this discussion I leave out the collateral though important subject of banking and currency.

The surplus, then, is the key to our financial situation. Every act of legislation should be studied in view of its effects upon the surplus. Two sets of forces are constantly acting upon the surplus. It is increased by the growth of the revenue and by the decrease of expenditure. It is decreased by the repeal or reduction of taxation, and by the increase of expenditures. When both forces conspire against it, when taxes are diminished and expenditures are increased, the surplus disappears. With the disappearance of the surplus comes disaster—disaster to the Treasury, disaster to the public credit, disaster to all the public interests.

In times of peace, when no sudden emergency has made a great and imperious demand upon the Treasury, a deficit cannot occur except as the result of unwise legislation or reckless and unwarranted administration. That legislation may consist in too great an increase of appropriations, or in too great a reduction of taxation, or in both combined.

Twice in the history of this nation a deficit has occurred in time of peace. In both instances it has occurred because Congress went too far in the reduction of taxation—so far as to cripple the revenues and deplete the Treasury. It may be worth our while to study those periods of our history in which deficits have thus occurred. I do not speak of periods of war, for then the surplus is always maintained by the aid of loans; but I speak of deficits occurring in times of peace.

From the close of the last war with England, in 1815, our revenues maintained a healthy and steady growth, interrupted only by years of financial crisis. A constant surplus was maintained sufficient to keep the Treasury steady and diminish the public debt, and finally complete its payment. But in 1833, the great financial discussion, which at one time threatened to dissolve the Union, was ended by the passage of the compromise tariff of 1833—a law that provided for the scaling down of the rates of taxation on imports in each alternate year until 1842, when all should be reduced to the uniform rate of 20 per cent. ad valorem. By this measure the revenues were steadily decreased, and in 1840 the Treasury was empty.

During the nine preceding years the receipts into the Treasury had averaged thirty-two millions a year; but in 1840 they had fallen to nineteen and a half millions, and in 1841 to less than seventeen millions. True, the expenditures had grown with the growth of the country; but no large or sudden expenditure appeared in any of those years. The deficit appeared, and it was unquestionably due to too great a reduction of taxation.

This deficit brought political and financial disaster. To meet it, a special session of Congress was convened in June, 1841, and President Tyler sent in his message in which he declared that by the end of the fiscal year of March 4, 1842, there would be a deficit of $11,406,132.98, and a further deficit by September, 1842, of $4,845,000. In his message of December 7, 1841, he reported a still further deficit and declared that these accumulated deficits were the results of the too great reduction of taxation by the legislation of 1833. These accumulated deficits amounted to more than all the receipts for that year. They were to that time what a deficit of three hundred millions would be to us to-day.

I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to declare that Congress had never increased taxation in time of peace. Our history does not bear him out in this assertion.

The Congress of 1841–'42 was called upon to repair the wasted revenues by an increase of taxation. The debates of that body show that the bill they passed was treated wholly as a necessity of the revenue. The bill itself was entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government." It became a law in 1842, and under its influence the revenues revived. In 1843 the surplus reappeared, and again the revenue scontinued to grow with the growth of the country. Excepting the period of the Mexican war, which, like all other modern wars, was supported by the aid of loans, the surplus continued down to and including the first year of Buchanan's administration.

During the four years of Pierce's administration, the revenues had exceeded seventy millions a year; but in the first year of Buchanan's term, an act was passed so largely reducing the duties on imports that the revenues dropped to forty-six and a half millions in 1858, and a deficit appeared which continued and accumulated until the coming in of Lincoln's administration.

Let us notice the growth of that deficit. On the 1st day of July, 1857, the public debt, less cash in the Treasury, was $11,350,272.63; on the 1st day of July, 1860, the account stood, total debt, less cash in the Treasury, $61,140,497, showing a deficit of fifty millions in the space of three years. When Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated, in 1861, the debt had increased to nearly ninety millions, and there had accumulated a deficit of more than seventy millions. And those four years of Buchanan's administration were not years of extraordinary expenditures. Indeed, during those four years, the expenditures had not averaged so great as in the last year of the administration of Mr. Pierce. The deficit then did not arise from an increase of expenditure, but from a decrease of revenue. For four years the Government had been paying its ordinary expenses by the aid of loans at ruinous rates, and by forced loans in the form of Treasury notes. Here, as in the former case, the final remedy for the deficit was taxation.

The first act of the last session of Congress in Buchanan's term was an act to authorize the issue of Treasury notes to meet the expenditures of the Government; and almost the last act of that session was the act of March 2, 1861, to provide for the payment of outstanding Treasury notes, and to meet the expenditures of the Government by increasing the duties on imports. This act was passed by a republican Congress, and was reluctantly approved by a President whose policy and whose party had produced the deficit, and brought financial distress upon the country by cutting too deeply and too recklessly into the public revenues.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. I want to inquire simply whether that deficit did not arise mainly from the timidity which Congress felt about increasing taxes in time of peace, and which we now feel about assessing additional taxes?

Mr. GARFIELD. Quite likely there was timidity about putting on taxes. But the deficit was caused by taking too many of them off, and the surplus was restored by putting them on again.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is it not the old story over again, an unwillingness to tax unless some emergency like a great war compels us to do so?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am merely stating the history of these two deficits. Before I close I will discuss the question whether we are to have another or not.

Mr. NIBLACK. I only want to make a note as we go along, for, as the gentleman will remember, I happened to be here in Congress at that time, and I know that to have been the case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have been appealing to the past to learn how deficits occur.

In view of its history, I am warranted in the declaration that our deficits in time of peace have resulted from legislation that has crippled the revenues, and that such deficits have been overcome only by replacing taxes too recklessly repealed.

Mr. Chairman, when this House convened in December last, we were startled by the declaration that another deficit was about to appear. We were informed that we might look for a deficit of forty-two millions by the end of the current fiscal year. This announcement was indeed the signal for alarm throughout the country; and it became the imperative duty of Congress to inquire as to whether there would be a deficit, and if so, to ascertain its cause and provide the remedy.

In this instance, to the ordinary causes that produce a deficit, there had been superadded the disastrous financial calamity that visited a portion of the business interests of this country in September last; a panic that fell with unparalleled weight and suddenness, and swept like a tornado, leaving destruction in its track. We have not yet sufficiently recovered from the shock to be able to measure with accuracy the magnitude of its effects. We cannot yet tell how soon and how completely the revenues of the country will recover from the shock. But we have sufficient data to ascertain, with some degree of accuracy, the part that the legislation of Congress has played in producing the situation in which we now find ourselves.

That we may more clearly trace the legislative steps by which we have reached our present position, I invite your attention to the condition of our finances at the close of the war. Leaving out of view the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, in which there was paid over the counter of the Treasury the enormous sum of $1,290,000,000, the accumulated products of taxation and of loans, we begin our examination with the year that followed the close of the war, the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866. In that year, our aggregate revenues, from all sources, exclusive of loans, amounted to $558,000,000, and our expenditures to nearly $521,000,000, leaving us a solid surplus of $37,000,000. These were the gigantic proportions of our income and our payments. From these as a base line we sketch the subsequent history of our finances. From these vast totals, the work of triple reduction began: reduction of the revenue by the repeal of taxes; reduction of ordinary payments by the decrease of expenditures; reduction of the public debt by applying to it the annual surplus.

I present a table which exhibits in parallel columns the annual receipts and expenditures from 1866 to 1873. These columns represent the converging lines that mark the reduction of taxes and the reduction of expenditures. As these lines approach each other the surplus diminishes; whenever they touch and cross each other, the surplus is gone and the deficit will appear.

Receipts and expenditures of the Government.

June 30, 1873	4, 5	333, 738, 204 67	290, 345, 245 33

From this table it will be seen that, in every year, save one, since the war, the revenues have been decreased by the reduction of taxes; and in every year, save two, the expenditures have decreased.

Two forces have been constantly at work, the one reducing expenditures, the other repealing taxes; and yet, by the aid of one and in spite of the other, a handsome surplus has been maintained in each of these years. By comparing the two columns given in the table, it will be seen that, notwithstanding the diminution of taxes, the surplus increased, until in 1870 it reached $100,000,000. Keeping in view the column of receipts into the Treasury, let us call to mind the various acts and amounts by which the burdens of taxation have been removed. The echoes of the last battle had hardly died away when Congress began the grateful work of reducing taxation.

By the act of July 13, 1866, internal duties were repealed to the amount of		$65, 000, 000
By the act of March 2, 1867, internal duties were further reduced by the sum of		40, 000, 000
By the acts of February, March, and July, 1868, internal duties were still further reduced by the sum of		68, 000, 000
By the act of July 14, 1870, the reduction was:
On internal revenue	$55, 000, 000
On customs	29, 526, 410
		84, 526, 410
By the acts of May 1, and June 6, 1872, the reduction as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, was, for eleven months of last year:
On customs	$44, 365, 364
On internal revenue	17, 695, 456
		62, 060, 820
Making a total reduction, since the close of the fiscal year 1866, of		319, 527, 230

I have here stated, not the total that these taxes would have produced if allowed to remain on the statute-books, but the amount they were producing at the dates of their repeal.

I have now examined the course of revenue and expenditure to the close of the last fiscal year.

On the 1st day of July, 1873, the Treasury closed with a surplus of $43,000,000, twenty-nine millions of which, however, were due to the sinking fund. If this year is to show a deficit, it will be because the expenditures have increased, or because the revenues are diminished from those of last year.

What are the facts? I give the figures for the two years, omitting the sinking fund from each; those for 1873 as they stand on the books of the Treasury, those for 1874 as estimated by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in his speech of February 12, as follows:

1873—Receipts	$333, 738, 204 64
1874—Receipts	281, 707, 922 99
Decrease	52, 030, 281 65

I do not admit the correctness of these estimates for the current year. The condition of the Treasury has grown better since the gentleman from Massachusetts made his speech. The gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] told us on Monday last that there is now good reason to believe that the revenues will be considerably larger than the figure estimated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and that the expenditures for the current year would be considerably less than his estimate. But taking the estimate as he gave it, and considering the situation in its worst aspect, the figures of the gentleman from Massachusetts show this: that, comparing this fiscal year with the last, our revenues have fallen off more than fifty-two millions, and the expenditures have increased less than two millions. From his own showing, therefore, it is undeniably true that if we are about to meet a deficit, that deficit will occur not because increased expenditures have cut away the surplus, but because the revenues have suffered a loss of fifty-two millions during the current fiscal year—a loss nine millions greater than the surplus of last year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how came we to lose this fifty-two millions of revenue, if, indeed, it is lost? The explanation of that loss can be found by examining our legislation that has reduced the revenues. Let us then go back to the month of July, 1870. The fiscal year had just closed with a surplus of one hundred millions. It was an opportunity to afford relief from the burdens of taxation. Congress determined by the act of July 14, 1870, to establish the sinking fund on a firm basis, by making a permanent appropriation for its annual support; and, having done that, repealed and reduced taxes to the amount of $84,500,000. That was the repeal which swept away the income tax, although it was to be collected for the following year. The Treasury did not at once feel the whole effect of so sweeping a repeal. In fact the income tax, repealed at that date, has been paying revenue into the Treasury ever since. During the last year, even, we received more than five millions of revenues from back taxes on incomes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me ask the gentleman whether we did not feel the effect of the repeal of customs duties immediately?

Mr. GARFIELD. In most cases, yes; but the chief reductions of 1870 were of internal-revenue taxes.

But, notwithstanding this heavy reduction, another was made in the months of May and June, 1872, which more particularly concerns the question of deficit we are now discussing. In spite of the reduction of 1870, an unusual amount of revenue came pouring into the Treasury during the year 1872—an amount sufficient, by the aid of reduced expenditures, to leave a surplus of more than $90,000,000. Was that revenue a stable surplus? Could it be relied on to continue and increase, even if no further reduction of taxes were made? Manifestly not. The Treasury had not yet felt the full effect of the reduction of 1870. There were paid into the Treasury in 1872 more than nineteen millions of back taxes on articles and occupations from which the tax had been removed by the act of 1870.

But there was another consideration which should have been borne in mind by Congress in its legislation of 1872. We were that year receiving an amount of revenue from customs far in excess of any other year. From commercial and other causes, which I will not pause to discuss, there had been an unusual and abnormal increase in the amount of foreign importations, an increase that we could not expect would continue. The revenues from customs that year were $30,000,000 above the average for the four preceding years, and ten millions more than in any other year of our history. It was not safe for Congress to calculate upon the continuance of that unusual revenue from customs.

For all these reasons it was inevitable that with any further repeal of taxes, the years 1873 and 1874 would show a falling off in revenues, resulting from former legislation; from the natural decrease of revenues from miscellaneous sources; and from the necessary falling off of importations from the unusual amount of the preceding year. These facts should have been taken into consideration in the spring of 1872, when it was proposed to make further reduction of taxes. No doubt a considerable reduction was possible and safe. The best estimate that could be made at that time fixed the limit of safe reduction at $50,000,000.

On the 3d of May, 1872, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in introducing his bill for further reduction of taxes, used these words:

> Fifty millions of reduction of taxes, including the reduction on tea and coffee—
> Which had just been made two days before—
> is the utmost limit of reduction admitted possible by any one who has the slightest responsibility for the administration of affairs for the financial credit of the nation.

Let it be remembered as a part of the current history of our legislation that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, speaking not only by the authority of his own position, but by the authority of the Treasury Department, declared that fifty millions was the utmost limit to which it was safe to go in the reduction of taxes; and yet, by the two acts of May 1 and June 6, 1872, Congress cut off from the vital revenues of the Government more than $62,000,000, nearly forty-five millions of which were in gold.

We have the testimony of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that the committee of conference, in the final adjustment of the bill, would have cut down still five millions deeper, but for the earnest protest of the Treasury Department. In his speech on the 3d of June, when the chairman presented the conference report to the House, he said that when the amount of proposed reduction "came to the ears of the Treasury officials, they brought down upon the committee official statements to show that if we reduced the revenues fifty-eight millions, those who were responsible for the administration of the Government were of the opinion that we should not have enough to pay the sinking fund." But for that protest the reduction would have been five millions greater; it would have been $67,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the whole amount of this reduction had afforded relief to the people from the burdens of taxation, and had been safe for the Treasury, it would have been a cause for public rejoicing. But we have the authority of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means for the declaration that while the act of May 1, 1872, deprived the Treasury of more than $25,000,000 in gold, it did not relieve the burdens of the people by a single dollar; that the whole of this vast sum was divided between the foreign producer at one end and the wholesale dealer at the other. I quote from his speech of February 12:

> When we took off the $25,000,000 from tea and coffee it did not reduce the price to the consumer of either article one half-penny. I have the prices-current of the country to bear me out that I am substantially, if not mathematically, accurate in the statement that the whole of the duty taken off was divided between the producer at the one end and the wholesale dealer at the other.

If this revenue, thus uselessly thrown away, were to-day coming into our Treasury we should have no fear of a deficit.

Mr. Chairman, it is a grateful task to remove burdens from the industries and the earnings of the American people. No more grateful work can an American Congress be called upon to perform. But while we are relieving the people from the burdens of taxation, it should always be borne in mind that we are in danger of so crippling the revenues as to embarrass the Government and endanger the public credit. It is a great thing to remove all burdensome taxes; but there is danger that while Congress may imitate Tennyson's Godiva, who—

> Took away the tax,
> And built herself an everlasting name,

yet in so doing, it may cause the public credit to go forth from a despoiled Treasury, and, like the Lady Godiva, ride naked in the streets of the world. We have had abounding faith in the elasticity of our revenues. We have found that even reduction of rates frequently brings us increased revenues; that the buoyant and almost immortal life of our industries will make the tree of our revenues bloom again, how oftensoever we may pluck its flowers and its fruit. We think of it as the fabled tree which Virgil's hero found in the grove of Avernus. Whenever the bough of gold was plucked away another sprang out in its place:

> Primo avulso non deficit alter
> Aureus; et simili frondescit virga metallo.

But, sir, we may pluck the golden bough once too often. We may pluck away with it the living forces of the tree itself. Just that mistake has been made twice before in our political history; a mistake which has always been atoned for only by planting new shoots on which new revenues might grow.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. COX. My friend from Ohio in 1872, I think, endeavored to cut down the taxes along with other gentlemen on both sides of the House. I would like to know from him what part of that action he objects to now; whether it was the removal of the duty on tea, or on coffee, or on what particular article? He reproaches us for our work. Will the gentleman, then, tell us wherein we were wrong?

Mr. GARFIELD. My worthy and learned friend will perhaps be relieved and pleased to learn that I was one of that small but unpopular company of twenty-five who voted against the repeal of the duty on tea and coffee, because they thought it unwise legislation.

Mr. COX. All right.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it not true that while we reduced the revenue in that particular, we failed to reduce the expenditures, as we should have done?

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend is anticipating some rough notes which are lying before me, and which I will refer to in a few moments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it wonderful, in view of these facts, that our estimated revenues for the current year should be one hundred and two millions less than the revenues for 1871? What more is needed to explain this falling off than the admitted fact, that since the beginning of the fiscal year 1871 we have repealed and reduced taxes to the amount of one hundred and forty-six and a half million dollars? And yet with that enormous reduction no man would question the soundness of the Treasury; no man would doubt but that to-day, in spite of the panic and all its effects, we should have a strong surplus in the Treasury but for the useless repeal of the duty on tea and coffee. I do not say that it is necessary to restore that duty. I am pointing out the effect of its repeal. With the single exception of the reduction on tea and coffee, I have heartily joined in all our legislation to reduce taxation.

Thus far I have been discussing the causes which have brought us to our present situation. It is important for us now to inquire precisely what that situation is. In this review I have been considering the estimated receipts and expenditures for the current year, as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means understands them to be. And his view of the case was based, at least in part, upon the situation as the Secretary of the Treasury understood it to be in December last.

In his annual report of December 1, the Secretary of the Treasury said that in consequence of the commercial crisis—

> The revenues have already fallen off sufficiently to make it important and necessary to exercise the greatest economy in appropriations and expenditures for the future. And should there not be a revival of business at an early day, and an increase in the receipts over those of the past two and a half months, additional means will be required to meet expenses. Should such be the case, I recommend additional taxation judiciously laid, so as to be the least burdensome upon the people and business of the country, rather than a resort to borrowing money and increasing the public debt. It is on the grounds here generally stated that I suggested increased taxation. * * * * *
> In any event, I earnestly commend every reduction in the appropriations which may be found possible, to the end that the economy which the people, suffering under the present embarrassment in business, are everywhere disposed to make, may be shared and encouraged by the Government through their public servants.

In his letter to the Committee on Ways and Means, under date of December 12, the Secretary said:

> The receipts from customs and internal taxes have not materially increased, and it is apparent that no considerable augmentation of those receipts is soon to be expected, under the laws now existing. The public debt was increased by demands which could not be avoided, during the month of November, to the extent of over $9,000,000; and it is apparent that it will be still further increased during the current month by many millions.
> While the coin receipts are but little more than sufficient to pay the interest on the public debt and other coin expenditures, it will not be prudent to sell gold to increase the supply of currency.
> The current expenses of the Government have already consumed about $18,000,000 of what has been called the "reserve," and there remains only about $26,000,000, which can be used before the extreme limit of issue of United States notes authorized by law will be reached. The public credit can only be maintained by keeping the receipts of the Treasury fully up to the expenditures, for ordinary expenses, for interest on the public debt, and for the purchase of bonds for the sinking fund, to the extent provided by law. It is manifestly the true policy, in view of the necessity of maintaining that credit, so to levy taxes as to make it certain that the required amount will be raised with the possibility of some surplus revenue, rather than to incur any risk of a deficiency which would make it necessary to borrow money and thereby increase the debt.

He submitted to the committee a proposition to levy additional taxes on spirits, tobacco, and gas, and on railroad, steamboat, express, insurance, and telegraph companies, to an aggregate amount of $22,150,000; and said:

> I have presented the bills for increased taxation to the committee thus early, that the subject may at once be called to the attention of Congress for such action at an early day as may be deemed expedient.

In writing this letter the Secretary surveyed the situation as it appeared when the worst effects of the crisis were felt by the Treasury. It was at that date that a deficit seemed imminent; and it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to give Congress the facts.

If there be a deficit, the duty of Congress is plain. First, to ascertain the smallest amount by which the necessary expenditures of the Government may be met; and if there still be a deficit, to meet it by restoring some of the revenues which we have crippled by too great a reduction of taxes. Retrenchment of expenses is the first duty, and the performance of that duty may be a perfect and complete remedy; but I do not indorse the doctrine that expenditures must be cut down, at all hazards, to the level of the revenues. If necessary, there must be help on both sides of the ledger. If there be a chasm to be bridged, it must be bridged by building from both shores; by decreasing the expenditures on one side and increasing the revenues on the other.

But, Mr. Chairman, the study which I have been able to give to this subject leads me to believe that the revival of business from the disastrous effects of the panic will so increase our revenues that by the aid of such reduction as may be made in the expenditures of the next fiscal year no deficit will occur; that the Treasury will not go to protest; that the public credit will not be impaired. Even the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who, to say the least, does not paint the situation with the color of the rose, tells us we shall have at the end of the present fiscal year, after all our deficiency appropriations are made, a surplus of ten millions. I think we shall have a larger sum.

The receipts for the month of February show a marked improvement. The official statement, published four days ago, shows that the debt was decreased during the month of February by the sum of $2,590,047.45; and, at the close of February, the Secretary estimated that the receipts for the current year will be eight millions more than the estimate which he sent to the Committee on Ways and Means at the beginning of that month.

Mr. Chairman, if I have been successful in the presentation of facts, I have made it apparent that, whatever danger of a deficit may have threatened the Treasury, that danger has been produced by two causes: too great a reduction of taxes, and the temporary crippling of the revenues by the commercial crisis. The last of these causes was beyond the control of legislation; but in spite of the storm no question of the soundness of the Treasury would have been raised if it had been kept strong by a sufficient surplus.

I come now to speak more particularly of our recent expenditures. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] very properly suggests, it is necessary to inquire what has been done on the other side of the ledger. We have thus far been considering the revenues. What have been our expenditures? And here, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to turn aside from the main line of discussion to notice the fact that frequent attempts have been made during the last three months to impress the public mind with the belief that the estimates, the appropriations, and the expenditures have not only been extravagant, but increasing, in recent years. If this is so, it brings to the door of Congress, and to all those whom Congress has intrusted with any share of responsibility on this subject, an imperative obligation to show cause for what they have done. I should not speak of this but for the fact that it has several times been referred to on this floor. That we may know just what the allegations are, I will quote three paragraphs from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

On the 15th of December, in the debate on revising the estimates, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said:

> Could I have my own way about it, the knife would go into that Book of Estimates * * until the difference between current receipts and expenditures should no longer exist. Sir, the Book of Estimates is a marvel to me. When I take up that broad book, so unlike that I used to carry under my arm, it is most unintelligible to me. The only thing I can realize and understand is, that year after year the estimates are going on increasing, until this year, in the face of these exigencies, the grand total of estimates is about twelve millions more than it was last year, and about fourteen millions more than the actual appropriations of last year.

In the next place, I call attention to a paragraph in a speech by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] on the 12th of January. In the debate on the naval appropriation bill he said:

> At the last session of the last Congress, after the last presidential election was over, and when members were not soon to be called to answer to the people, then, for the first time since I have been in Congress, for the first in the history of the country as I believe, Congress appropriated $15,329,000 more than all the estimates of all the Departments. Three hundred and eight million dollars was the amount the Departments asked; Congress gave them $319,600,000, and $4,000,000 more the other day, making $323,000,000, an excess of $15,000,000, the highest amount ever given in time of peace, and that, too, immediately after the last presidential election was over. And let this be observed—we are spending these immense sums now, when only last year $302,000,000 was called for by the estimates, and $299,000,000 was the amount of the appropriations.

And that we may have the whole chapter before us, I ask the Clerk to read the following paragraph in the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] made on the 12th of February.

The Clerk read as follows:

> While we have been reducing our receipts on the one side we have been increasing our expenditures on the other. Listen now to the expenditures of this Government since the present Administration came into power. The first year the expenses of this Government were $322,865,277.80; in 1870 they were $309,653,560.75; in 1871 they were $292,177,188.25; 1872 they were $277,517,962.67; in 1873 they were $290,345,245.33; the appropriations for the present year sum up $319,652,644.31. In 1870 we reduced our expenditures to $309,000,000 and we paid $101,601,916.88 of the public debt; in 1871 we brought them down from $309,653,560.75 to $292,177,188.25, and we paid $94,327,764.84 of the public debt; in 1872 we brought them down still further to $277,517,962.67, and we paid $99,960,253.54 of the public debt in addition. In 1873 the expenditures ran up to $290,345,245.33, and we paid but $43,677,630,05 of the public debt. This year our appropriations have gone up from $290,000,000, our expenses for the last year, to $319,000,000, without paying one dollar of the public debt.

> Mr. GARFIELD. I would ask the gentleman if by accident he has not included in his figures of last year the sinking fund, amounting to $30,000,000, which was not included in the expenditures of last year? I think he will find that he has done so.

> Mr. DAWES. I have not done it by accident, but by design. The expenditures for each year, as I have given them, contain the sinking fund, or else I am misled by the Treasury Department itself.

Mr. GARFIELD. To these three points, as they represent the three ideas of estimates, appropriations, and expenditures, I desire now to respond briefly. I did respond to two of them at the time.

I will not pause to notice the rather singular criticism made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in reference to the bulk of the Book of Estimates, except to say that two years ago the Committee on Appropriations found this fault with the estimates: that they were too condensed in their statements; that the estimates and the reasons therefor were not given with sufficient detail; and at the suggestion of the committee the Secretary of the Treasury ordered a fuller statement, and gave us a quarto instead of a duodecimo. Now, while the quarto is somewhat too large for a pocket companion, yet it happens the bulk of the book is not a measure of the appropriations asked for; that the modest little quarto that former chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations carried under their arms estimated a great many millions more of appropriations than the swollen quarto which I have had the honor to carry during the last two years.

Referring to the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] it would indeed be a grave matter and one requiring explanation if Congress had appropriated $15,000,000 above the amount estimated as necessary for the public service. I answered at the time that what the gentleman called the estimates of last session were only the aggregate given in the regular Book of Estimates sent in on the first day of the session. I also showed that from the day that book was sent in until the last day of the session additional estimates were constantly coming in. For instance, a whole book of estimates of deficiencies, amounting to more than $6,000,000, came in after the regular Book of Estimates was printed. I have here compiled from the records of the Committee on Appropriations a list of those estimates that came to the House or to the committee from the several Departments after the Book of Estimates came in, and the total amounts to the sum of $23,392,540.36. These were just as really estimates as though they had
